Sounds healthy

SCOTT HARRIS
// SCOTT@VUEWEEKLY.COM

At first blush it sure sounds like a good news story: a report on a new initiative aimed at reducing the advertising of unhealthy food and drinks to children finds that all the companies involved met or exceeded the project's first-year goals. It's exactly the kind of initiative needed in the face of an epidemic in Canada, where one in four children are now considered overweight or obese.

Of the 16 companies which took part in the first year of the Canadian Children's Food and Beverage Advertising Initiative (CAI)—including heavyweights like Coca-Cola, McDonald's and Hershey—half met their commitment to do no direct advertising to children under 12 and the other eight far exceeded requirements that at least half their advertising go to promoting only products that met CAI nutrition standards, directing all of their advertising to promoting healthy options.

Of course, it's an entirely voluntary program overseen by Advertising Standards Canada, an national advertising industry self-regulatory body, which, like most industry self-regulators, works to ensure there's no actual regulation of industry.

It's also a program with odd standards. One laudable principle, that companies "not advertise food or beverage products in elementary schools," is weakened somewhat by its footnote: "This limitation does not apply to displays of food and beverage products, and charitable/not-for-profit activities including fundraising, public service messaging and educational programs." This allowed, for example, the Hershey's Track and Field Games to continue, and with it the promotion of such fitness-friendly products as Eat-More and Cigars Licorice Candy ... and almost every other imaginable marketing approach.

Participants were also required to adhere to "company-specific nutrition criteria," which to McDonald's means serving sizes of no more than 600 calories, where as much as 10 percent of calories can come from saturated fat, 35 percent from total fat and sugars could make up as much as 25 percent of total weight. Very healthy.

There's no doubt more needs to be done to encourage healthy eating in Canada, but a voluntary program that allows companies to set their own standards and quit when they want hardly seems like what we need. Perhaps a better approach, if such companies are truly committed to health promotion, is to stop fighting stricter government regulation aimed at the same goal, regulations with uniform and enforceable standards, that don't stop at age 12. SUN SALUTATIONS

As a former melanoma patient, I would like to congratulate Connie Howard on her very intelligent article discussing the issue of sunscreen safety ("Here comes the sun," Jun 18 – Jun 24, 2009). I have often worried that some of the ingredients in sunscreens cannot have been adequately tested. It is very much a question of trying to minimize the risks, whether you use sunscreen or not!

Keep writing articles like this—I am sure I am not the only one looking for such information. You are doing a real service.

CANADA HAS LOST ITS WAY

We read in the Foreign Press that ex-US Congresswoman Cynthia McKinney has been released by Israel after having been imprisoned when the ship she was on was seized in international waters by Israel. This was an act of war committed by Israel, yet we heard not one word in our "free" press in Canada. Our prime minister did not make a comment. We hear about the Somali pirates and an election in Iran, we hear about Michael Jackson, but not one word about this illegal act by our "great friend" Israel.

What Cynthia McKinney and 20 other people were doing was bringing relief supplies to the people of Gaza. The supplies included medicine, food and toys for children. All was seized by Israel to "protect their sovereignty." I guess crayons pose a risk to Israel's security? The main question remains: will Israel distribute these supplies to the Gazans or will they be confiscated? I leave that question with you because we will never hear the answer because Israel can do no wrong in the eyes of our government.

"Canada stands with Israel" is a famous statement made by Prime Minister Stephen Harper just before Operation Cast Lead, which devastated Gaza, began last December. Canada not having the courage to stand against evil when it is being perpetrated makes us equal partners in these atrocities. We are complicit in the death and destruction and in seizing relief supplies and imprisoning those bringing them.

We should hang our heads in shame for keeping our eyes closed to the illegal acts being committed against the Palestinians and those trying to bring them aid. This is not the Canadian way. And so, it appears that we as a country have lost our way. Though wrong is wrong no matter who does it, Israeli actions are being accepted without comment.

Rebecca Gingrich

State of denial

New book challenges the claims and influence of AIDS denialists

BRYAN BIRTLES
//BRYAN@VUEWEEKLY.COM

As the first global pandemic in the age of modern media, HIV and AIDS have long been the subjects of wild rumours and misinformation. First recognized in the two socially marginalized groups of intravenous drug users and homosexual men, HIV and AIDS became lightning rods for vicious stigmatization and various untruths about how the disease could be spread. Public relations campaigns featuring celebrities and scientists fought against the misinformation which erupted in the media in the late '80s and early '90s, and were effective at ridding the general consciousness of false notions such as that AIDS could be transmitted through mosquitoes or by coming into casual contact with an infected individual.

In more recent years, however, the Internet has given rise to a new wave of rumours—AIDS denialism. Stimulated by the wider audience and the ability to say anything on the Internet, a small group of people who don't believe that HIV causes AIDS or who believe that the antiretroviral therapies used to combat HIV and AIDS are toxic poisons, have begun to communicate with each other, create outreach materials and try to influence others.

In some cases, this influence has been vast, and deadly. Influenced by information from the Internet as well as direct contact with a number of prominent AIDS denialists, former South African president Thabo Mbeki refused to implement a significant antiretroviral therapy program in that country, while at the same time denying that HIV caused AIDS. These actions, coupled with his government's promotion of vitamins and natural "cures" as better alternatives than antiretroviral therapies led to an estimated 330 000 deaths between 2000 and 2005, according to a 2008 Harvard study.

It was this power and influence over life-and-death policy decisions that attracted Seth Kalichman to the topic of AIDS denialism. A professor of psychology at the University of Connecticut and a National Institutes of Health (NIH)-funded AIDS researcher into the behavioural factors of AIDS, Kalichman has recently written a book about the denialist movement, entitled Denying AIDS: Conspiracy Theories, Pseudoscience, and Human Tragedy, which outlines the history of denialism as well as its consequences. Chief among these consequences is the scores of deaths in South Africa, he says, but the effect of misinformation available to anyone with an Internet connection can be felt much closer to home.

DENY, DENY, DENY >> Seth Kalichman's Denying AIDS takes on the denialists // Supplied

"Once you start looking at what was happening in South Africa you see then also what's been happening in Canada, in Australia, in the UK, in the US, in Mexico, really on every continent," he says. "It's the promotion of false information that is confusing people that there is actually a debate about AIDS, that is telling people that they don't have to worry about their HIV test results because just as many scientists say HIV doesn't exist. It's that promotion of false information that's the problem."

Making a clear distinction between denial and denialism, Kalichman explains that it is natural for anyone facing the spectre of a life threatening disease to experience denial, to say, "This can't be happening to me." The problem is that when vulnerable individuals facing such a diagnosis go looking for information, they're faced with well-organized and slickly packaged websites purporting to offer medical information, but which ultimately deny that AIDS exists or that HIV causes AIDS.

"Those are really the victims of AIDS denialism, people who are seeking information and can't tell the difference between quality medicine and science and quackery and pseudoscience," Kalichman says, explaining that researchers may never know how many people have been convinced to forego legitimate therapies based on the conspiracy theories of AIDS denialists. "It's normal and natural for anyone who's diagnosed with a life-threatening disease to experience denial. What AIDS denialists are then saying is, 'You're right. It's not happening to you—there is no such thing as HIV causing AIDS. You really need to look at this information—it may not even be something you need to worry about.' These are the claims that have taken on a life of their own."

As a psychologist, however, Kalichman's interest in studying AIDS denialists wasn't solely about reducing the harm being caused by the myths these groups propagate; he was also interested in the type of mindset that could incubate the vast conspiracy theories needed to explain why scientists and governments would work so hard to promote "false" information.

"People who buy into AIDS denialism and people who are propagating AIDS denialism are psychologically interesting—they represent some interesting traits and vulnerabilities and I don't think anyone's been trying to understand the AIDS denialists," he says, explaining that while they don't share one characteristic, most denialists believe there is a conspiracy between pharmaceutical companies, academics and governments to promote the idea that HIV causes AIDS in order to make money off the disease.

"Everyone who promotes AIDS denialist ideas have a real suspicion against the government, against the pharmaceutical companies, academics and science and so there's a complete and total rejection of, for example, the enterprise of peer review, that it's set up to sustain the status quo."

In order to get closer to the people he was studying, Kalichman went undercover, posing as "Joe," a student of public health interested in alternative theories of AIDS—a claim not necessarily untrue. By doing so, Kalichman got an insider's perspective on the movement and its leaders.

"I thought the best way to understand what's going on with this is to get an inside view," he says. "These guys would never talk to me, they'll never trust me—Seth Kalichman is an NIH-funded researcher, there isn't anywhere in the world that I'm going to get an accurate representation of what they're about."

Two cheers for two degrees

Deeper cuts needed than G8 and other leaders agreed to, but a two-degree limit is the best we are going to get now

PROMISES, PROMISES >> Domestic politics meant the leaders of the G8 and G5 agreed to what they could, not what is necessary (Supplied G8 website/Ansa photo by: Massimo Percossi)

DYER STRAIGHT
gwynne@vueweekly.com
Gwynne Dyer

This is how the human race does business. What the G8 summit in Italy decided to do about climate change last week was much less than is necessary, but the very best that a realist could have hoped for. Some tens of millions of people will probably die as a result, or some hundreds of millions if we are really unlucky, but there is still time to avoid the worst. And anyway, it can't be helped: this is the way we do business.

An example. President Barack Obama has hired the best people in the business as his climate advisers. They know exactly how grave the situation is, and so does Obama. Yet when his chief scientific adviser, John Holdren, was asked why the US would not commit to the same target for greenhouse gas emissions by 2020 as the European Union, he replied as follows.

"If we had not wasted the last eight years, we could probably achieve that target. But we did waste the last eight years and in consequence, it doesn't make a lot of sense for us to officially embrace a target that is not realistically within reach." Analyze that sentence, and what it says is: we didn't do what we should have for the past eight years, so we can't do what we should for the next 12 years either.

Get upset about it if you like, but this is how the system works. Obama cannot ignore the fact that climate change denial is still stronger in the United States than anywhere else, and that much of the US Congress is a wholly owned subsidiary of the fossil fuel industries. He's going as far as he can, for now. He can't go any farther even if what he's doing is not good enough, which it isn't.

All the parts of the system work like that, not just the American parts. The Indian government, for example, cannot ignore the resentment felt by most Indians when their country is asked to cut its greenhouse gas emissions and slow its own development to deal with a problem that India had little role in creating.

Almost all the excess greenhouse gas that is in the air now were put there by the old industrialized countries, yet the newly industrializing ones like India will be hurt first and worst by the resulting climate change. Cutting their emissions means slowing their escape from poverty, which the old rich countries were never required to do—and if they refuse, climate change will hurt them even faster and worse. No matter which way they jump, India's decision-makers will face the anger of the voters.

Every country comes to the table with powerful lobbies at home to satisfy, and it's something of a miracle that the 18 biggest emitters, countries that together account for 80 percent of human greenhouse gas emissions, all managed to agree that the average global temperature should never be allowed to rise more than 2 degrees Celsius above the 1900 level. But there were other important things that they didn't agree on.

The big industrialized countries of the G8 (US, Russia, Japan, Germany, Britain, France, Italy and Canada) said they would cut their emissions by 80 percent by 2050, and asked the developing countries to cut their emissions enough to produce 50 percent global cuts by the same date. The developing countries refused.

But those same rapidly industrializing countries of the G5 (China, India, Brazil, Mexico and South Africa) then called the rich countries' bluff by demanding that the G8 set an interim target for emissions cuts by 2020. Any leader can make promises for 2050, safe in the knowledge that they won't be around by then. Promises for 2020, on the other hand, may fall due while you're still in the game—so the G8 leaders refused.

Nevertheless, the idea that all these countries, plus five other big emitters (the European Union, Indonesia, Egypt, South Korea and Australia) would actually agree in mid-2009 on a never-exceed target of +2° C would have been seen as fantasy only 18 months ago. "It certainly doesn't give you a roadmap on how you should get there but at least they've defined the destination," said Rajendra K. Pachauri, the chair of the Inter-Governmental Panel on Climate Change.

Well, not quite, because even at only 2° C hotter the world would be running out of food (global warming hits food production very badly), and that would lead to waves of refugees, failed states, and savage local wars over the remaining water, especially in the sub-tropical regions. Moreover, the two-degree target gives us only a 50 percent chance of avoiding tipping points that would lead to runaway warming.

So we ought to have much more ambitious targets now, and strict penalties for those countries that miss or evade them. Our children's future really does depend on it. But we can't have stricter targets yet, because the international political system does not work that fast—and we have no time to redesign it.

If we are lucky, some early disasters that don't kill too many people will frighten the world's countries into accepting tougher cuts in emissions while there is still time to avoid the worst, but this is the best that we are going to get for now. So two cheers for the two-degree limit. V

DENYING AIDS

His approach has garnered a fair amount of criticism from denialist camps, which at the same time asserted that no one told him anything they wouldn't have told anyone else. Nonetheless, his book has been decried by many as unethical from a research standpoint, a claim Kalichman refutes.

"There's no question that I wasn't doing research—this was not a part of my research, this was on my own time and it was to write this book. It's not like my NIH-funded research—I don't have a grant to study the AIDS denialists and I went through some unethical procedure," he says. "It was more, and I say this in Denying AIDS, like the work that a journalist would do than what an AIDS researcher would do."

Kalichman has also been criticized for comparing AIDS denialists with Holocaust denialists, but Kalichman asserts that it's a fair comparison—no matter what kind of denialism is being talked about, whether it's AIDS, the Holocaust, climate change, the anti-vaccine movement or the 9/11 truth movement, the tactics, rhetoric and mindset is always the same.

"The principles that they're all built on is a mistrust of the historical record. In the case of Holocaust denial there's a promotion of the idea that there is a debate between historians, and the same could be said between scientists on the AIDS side. Holocaust deniers will cherry-pick historical facts and pull them out of context, AIDS denialists do the same thing, they cherry-pick the science. When you present a Holocaust denier with evidence that the Holocaust did exist to refute what they said, they change what they said, they do what is called 'moving the goal posts' and AIDS denialists do the same thing," he says. "So I don't think it's unfair, I think it is what it is."

Delving so deeply into AIDS denialism gave Kalichman an understanding of the structure that underlies the entire movement. On the one hand, he says, there are what he calls the academics, individuals who present themselves as scientists or as authorities on the subject. On the other are the activists, mainly HIV-positive people such as Karri Stokely or the recently-deceased Christine Maggiore (who died from AIDS). The activists are in denial about their status, and want desperately to believe that there is no such thing as HIV or AIDS. These two groups rely on each other—the academics need the attention and the activists need the assurance—and the proselytizing by both groups brings new converts.

"The academics are coming at this from a completely narcissistic, self indulging, on-the-world-stage-opportunity place. They're just asking to be treated like legitimate scientists on equal par with everybody else—that's what they want, and they see this as a way to get it," he says. "People like Karri Stokely are clearly in malignant denial—it's so unacceptable to believe you have a life-threatening disease when you have two little kids—it's perfectly clear why that would be so hard. People who buy into AIDS denialism are motivated by that same place. She, like Christine Maggiore, has taken it to a different level—where the bubble is so fragile around her that she has to maintain this reality and convince everyone else that HIV is a fraud."

Ultimately, Kalichman hopes that his book will help people diagnosed with HIV or AIDS. Not only are all of the royalties from sales of the book being donated towards purchasing antiretrovirals in Africa, he's hoping that the book will help sort out the misinformation that exists on the topic of HIV and AIDS and can cause such harm to newly diagnosed people just looking for legitimate information.

"I'm part of that group that believes we really can't ignore these guys—we have to be out front calling them on what they're saying and pointing out who they are. They are not legitimate scientists, not one of them, and I think people need to have that kind of information so they can sort it out." V

WIN FOR THE SAGE-GROUSE

Environmental groups are celebrating what they say is a landmark decision by a Vancouver federal court, which found that Minister of the Environment Jim Prentice violated federal law by refusing to identify critical habitat in a recovery plan for the endangered greater sage-grouse.

The court ruled in its July 9 decision that it was "unreasonable" that the minister has failed to designate critical habitat of the bird given the amount of available scientific information about the sage-grouse and its breeding grounds.

"This decision confirms our view that the minister of the environment is routinely breaking the law by refusing to identify the habitat of species on the brink of extinction," said Devon Page, the executive director of Ecojustice, which brought the case on behalf of a number of environmental groups in Alberta and Saskatchewan. "This is only one in a series of endangered species cases we've had to bring to force the government to do its duty."

Once widespread, the sage-grouse, known for its elaborate mating dance, has been listed as endangered since 1998. Environmentalists say their numbers have dropped across the Prairies partly as a result of habitat fragmentation from oil and gas developments.

"The sage-grouse case will put an end to years of government inaction," said Cliff Wallis, the vice-president Alberta Wilderness Association, one of the organizations represented in the case. "There is reason to believe endangered species across Canada will finally receive protection with federal courts forcing the government to obey its own laws."

The government's legal counsel is reviewing the decision.

Still some fight left in 'em

Despite legal setback, those opposed to sale of Epcor generating assets pledge to continue the fight

SAMANTHA POWER
// SAMANTHA@VUEWEEKLY.COM

The April 17 closed-door decision by city council to sell off its power-generating assets to create Capital Power has left Edmontonians with much to debate around the issues of privatization of public assets and the need for greater transparency under the pyramid.

Since the announcement in early May—fully three weeks after the deal was approved by all but two city councillors—a range of voices has decried the move, charging that city council abandoned its democratic duty by making the decision in secret, while others believe the sale itself should not have occurred. Many Edmontonians became concerned about the public nature of the city-owned company and the future security of public resources and assets. Richard Zwicker was among them.

"When I heard of the sale on May 8 I was gobsmacked," Zwicker recalls. "I called public interest groups in the city and tried to find out who was going to do something about this. It turns out a number of other people were making the same call, and so we formed Our Power."

Our Power is the citizen action group which filed a court injunction in an attempt to stop the closing of the sale, which was rejected on July 3 by Court of Queen's Bench Justice Ged Hawco, giving the green light to the initial public offering for Capital Power.

But even though the group failed to stall the sale, Zwicker says the group plans to move forward in its campaign to challenge the sale, both inside and outside the courtroom, as it looks forward to the next round of municipal elections in October 2010.

"This is not a done deal. We have standing in the courts to examine everyone on council under oath," Zwicker says. "But we don't want to rely on the courts. We are putting together a campaign and building Our Power to initiate a petition for the next election that would call for a plebiscite on the sale. We need 85 000 signatures in a period of 60 days. But our main message right now is that this is not a done deal, as the mayor and Epcor would have you believe."

WHOSE POWER? >> The Genesee Generating Station is one of 31 generating facilities now owned by Capital Power // Supplied, Capital Power

But Bill Pidruchney, the lawyer bringing the case forward on behalf of Our Power, says that since the decision was made in secret, the group's legal strategy is necessary to properly inform Edmontonians about the details of the sale.

Another legal action calling for a judicial review of the sale was filed on July 7 by the Alberta Federation of Labour, Civic Services Union 52 and CUPE 30.

"It seems the only way citizens are going to find anything out is through the courts, rather than the open and transparent government we expect from our leaders," Pidruchney says.

What Edmontonians do know is that they own less of Epcor now than they previously did. The April 22 decision put the power generating aspect of the business into a publicly traded company, 71 percent owned by Epcor and 29 percent owned by shareholders.

But Ward 5 Councillor Don Iveson, who voted in favour of the deal at the meeting, says council did the best job it could for the city and insists that the sale doesn't significantly change the status quo, since the power-generating aspect of the business already had a publicly traded side in Epcor Power LP, which Epcor owned just 30 percent of.

"Functionally, Edmonton Power was privatized into Epcor; it was privatized in 1996," Iveson says. "So I understand the frustration that it's not under public ownership, but ownership does not mean that it was under our control. This is really just a restructuring of our ownership, not a restructuring of control that we didn't really have."

But Zwicker insists something has changed, and he says the Our Power campaign aims to let Edmontonians know what they might be missing out on now that the sale has happened.

"If you look at when they deregulated power to make it easier to invest in power generating assets, the risk for producing power is nil. Everyone needs power," Zwicker says. "By owning our own portion we can control how much we put into the grid. Even though the rate is not controlled there is a return to Edmontonians and a security of supply, instead of shipping it down off the border, which I fear will happen. I am frightened for the future of our public resources."

But it's precisely that deregulated market, including the federal government's recent changes to rules on income trusts and future environmental regulations on fossil fuel-based industries, that Iveson says made city council think twice about continuing to be in the power generation business.

"Epcor representatives suggested, as the electricity-generating aspect of the company is the riskiest, we should look at a model to reduce the risk and potential fluctuations in our dividends," he says. "So the decision was the power-generating business would be put into Capital Power, and sell a portion of that company to raise money to grow the three stable lines of the company: fresh water, waste water and electricity transmission."

Despite voting in favour of the deal—only councillors Ben Henderson and Amarjeet Sohi voted against it, while Linda Sloan was absent from the meeting due to a family emergency—Iveson has been outspoken about his discomfort with the process through which council arrived at such a critical decision.

"I was really uncomfortable with the private nature of the decision. I asked an awful lot of questions of our legal counsel, Epcor's legal counsel and their independent counsel," he says. "Then we talked about it as a city council a great deal to do this decision publicly and it was ultimately decided that we had to put the whole decision together first and then make the decision public."

The whole experience, Iveson says, has made him realize some changes are required to ensure adequate public input on similar decisions in the future.

"On July 22 I'm bringing forward a motion to council to move us closer to public disclosure on decisions as Epcor shareholders," he says. "It will look at amendments to our bylaws, the Epcor shareholder agreement and their bylaws as a corporation to ensure, particularly with assets owned by the City of Edmonton, that any further business cases for sale would have to come to the City of Edmonton, rather than these closed-door sessions as shareholders."

It's a sentiment that Zwicker can definitely agree with. He argues that the way the decision was made, and the overlapping roles of city councillors and Epcor shareholders means the decision was a violation of the Municipal Government Act, and something that needs to be clarified before similar decisions are made in the future.

"City councillors pretended they were shareholders of Epcor to make the decision," he says. "They didn't need to and we believe we have strong legal grounds that it violates the act." V

Proven prevention?

WELL, WELL WELL
health@vueweekly.com
Connie Howard

Not H1N1, human or swine, but yet another new flu strain announced by Canadian officials, this one with genes from a seasonal H1N1 strain and a swine H3N2 strain—it's enough to make our heads spin, unless of course we remember that viruses swap genes and create new strains almost as often as we humans swap phone numbers and run for the cure.

Health Canada has issued reminders to stick to proven antiviral drugs, and to avoid unproven alternative remedies. But proven treatments are hard to come by. Late last year, the US Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC) advised against Tamiflu treatment of the seasonal flu, because 49 out of 50 samples tested resisted the drug. And this week, we learned that some cases of Tamiflu-resistant swine flu have been showing up. Not that we didn't already know that viruses regularly become resistant to drugs. Like us, they want to survive, and will mutate to do so.

All of which makes the description of "proven treatment" a tad questionable: Tamiflu is known only to potentially shorten the duration of the flu by one or two days, to be mostly ineffective unless administered within 24 hours of symptoms showing up and to somewhat reduce the risk of secondary infections. It isn't recommended for pregnant or breastfeeding women, or for anyone with kidney, respiratory, heart or other serious health conditions. Health Canada also issued a Tamiflu warning a few years ago around reports of infrequent but serious reactions that included self injury, hallucinations, respiratory failure, heart palpitations and death.

The FDA found no causal relationship between the drug and the reactions, but really, whether it was the drug or a resistant flu virus causing those kinds of problems, it all sounds more limited and risky than it does proven or therapeutic. Still, the US plans to give 420 000 treatment courses of Tamiflu to the Pan-American Health Organization to help fight the swine flu in Latin America and the Caribbean.

Tamiflu's benefit to Gilead Sciences (which holds the patent), to Roche and to major shareholders such as former Gilead chairman Donald Rumsfeld, who not long ago refused to comment for journalists on the matter of vested interest, is, however, much less uncertain than its benefit to us.

And speaking of Rumsfeld and all things defensive and offensive and war-like, the International Red Cross reported last week that six months after Israel's offensive in Gaza, Palestinians there are still feeling it immensely—it has stolen the health of thousands of children there. Malnutrition, acute anemia, stunted growth and sonic-boom induced deafness is widespread. Over half the population under the age of 12 are seriously depressed and have been found to have no will to live, and power fluctuations make even the temperatures of incubators for newborns uncertain.

But the self-absorbed, wealthy West makes up for misdeeds by doing good things too in far-away places, no? Like with the $500 million the Bush Administration gave for AIDS drugs to Africa in 2002. The main component of the gift was a drug called nevirapine, a drug whose toxicity was well-known enough that it had already been pulled out of the FDA approval process for use in the US at that time.

Trials were run in Africa though, and 38 babies died in the study, 16 on nevirapine, 22 on AZT. As a result, nevirapine was, because it was less deadly than AZT, deemed safe and effective for preventing mother-child transmission of HIV—even though transmission rates vary widely and have been shown in some studies to be as low as 12 percent without any drug interventions, and even though the transmission rate in this study with nevirapine was 13 percent.

Dr. Edmund Tramont of the National Institute of Health (NIH) censored the reporting of the thousands of toxic reactions, and fellow AIDS researcher Dr. Jonathan Fishbein got fired for outing him.

Juxtapose that with an earlier study that had shown an unproven alternative treatment, vitamin A, to reduce transmission to seven percent—a finding which is consistent with a large body of literature linking nutritional status to HIV positive readings and health problems of every kind—and the mind boggles.

But supplying nutritious food and non-pharmaceutical solutions to epidemics sounds so basic, so primitive, so inadequate—and bringing antiviral drugs and democracy and the promise of the excesses of capitalism to the rest of the world is so modern, so powerful and glamourous, so very right. And so good for the economy here in the land of milk and honey. V

Stelmach's vow not to increase taxes is irresponsible and undemocratic

RICARDO ACUÑA

Any political strategist will tell you that it is not bright to discuss taxes and, in particular, tax hikes in the middle of a recession. This little bit of conventional wisdom, however, has not managed to keep Premier Ed Stelmach and several members of his cabinet from putting Alberta's tax revenues front and centre in the public eye over the past few weeks.

Numerous cabinet ministers have in the past month mused publicly about the need for, and inevitability of, tax hikes to balance the province's books. Sustainable Resources Minister Ted Morton was perhaps the most unequivocal in his assertion to reporters that tax increases were inevitable, but even Treasury Board President Lloyd Snelgrove got into the game by musing publicly about the need for a sales tax in Alberta.

Premier Ed Stelmach put an end to all this speculation when he told reporters point blank last week that "as long as I'm premier of this province there will be no tax increases." He also made sure reporters knew that "that's a very clear message I sent to cabinet, a very clear message to my caucus."

The premier accentuated his very clear message by proceeding to roll back the increase in alcohol taxes that was introduced with the provincial budget just a few months ago—a move which will effectively take $180 million out of provincial coffers this year.

As always, the economic and political advisability of this move was never mentioned by the premier. Albertans have never been presented with an assessment demonstrating that current tax rates are adequate or appropriate. It seems as though Ralph Klein arbitrarily decided during his tenure as premier where taxes should be set and how they should be structured, and now Mr. Stelmach is willing to defend those rates as the gospel truth. Keep in mind that Mr. Klein also had no analysis or rationale for where he pegged the tax rates—they seem to have been set based on numbers he pulled out thin air. So why is the premier defending those same rates and structures so adamantly?

'NO NEW TAXES' >> Well, I guess it did work for George Bush Courtesy Office of the Premier

Perhaps it's time the government in this province got a short lesson in basic economics. Individual and corporate taxes are any government's most stable and ethical revenue sources, followed closely by its investment income. In Alberta, however, our government has chosen to forego stability of revenue and depend instead on income from the oil and gas sector to finance its goods and services.

In the 2008/09 fiscal year, over one-third of provincial government revenue—the funds the government uses to fund the goods, services and infrastructure that Albertans depend on—came from non-renewable resources. The stupidity of depending that heavily on a revenue source that is that volatile should be evident to anyone who has lived through the last three oil price collapses in Alberta.

The philosophical premise behind taxation is simple. Things like roads, health care, education and police services would be next to impossible to accomplish in any significant way if we were each individually responsible for them. They only become possible, and much more affordable, if we all pool our money and pay for them collectively, with the governments we elect making sure that the money is being spent according to our collective wishes and priorities. Because corporations and businesses also directly benefit from the goods, services and infrastructure in place, it is only natural that they foot part of the collective bill as well.

Given that foundation, it should be fairly straightforward to determine optimum rates for individual and corporate taxes. You do a calculation of the costs of providing the goods and services that people in a jurisdiction need and have prioritized, and you set your tax rate accordingly. This may be a substantial over-simplification, but it is the essence of how taxation works.

Successive Alberta governments, however, seem to have gotten the entire thing backwards. It seems they have started from a place of arbitrarily deciding what the tax rate should be, and then proceeded to determine what services can be "afforded" at that level of revenue. This despite the reality that in poll after poll Albertans have made it clear that they are willing to pay the taxes necessary to ensure that the core services and infrastructure they need are properly funded.

The bottom line is that there is more than enough room in Alberta to wean ourselves off of volatile natural resource revenues and move toward a more stable system of taxation. The government's own figures suggest that re-instituting a progressive tax system (instead of the current flat tax) and bringing the tax rates more in line with those of other provinces would generate increased revenue of between $8 billion and $15 billion per year.

Even if we focus on the low end of that range, an extra $8 billion this year would be more than enough to meet our budget shortfall this year, and allow us to make much-needed new investments, instead of arbitrary cuts, to the goods and services we collectively rely on. Moreover, because the figure is based on the low end of the range, we could do this without negatively impacting the provincial economy in any way, as we would still have the lowest taxes in the country. In fact, the added investment in public services and infrastructure would actually serve to create jobs and stimulate the economy. Isn't that what we're ultimately after in the midst of this recession?

In the end, Albertans have made it clear what they expect from their government in terms of public services and infrastructure. It is irresponsible and undemocratic of the Stelmach government to ignore those wishes based solely on an ideologically driven imperative to keep taxes artificially low and eliminate public services. Albertans should be outraged by the premier's assertion that he will never raise taxes, and they should demand a public accounting of how he intends to continue providing the services they need without addressing revenues. Every budget has two sides, and Albertans deserve a government that is willing to look at both.

HIV EDMONTON, FORMERLY KNOWN AS THE AIDS NETWORK OF EDMONTON, BEGAN WITH FIVE PEOPLE GATHERED AROUND MICHAEL PHAIR'S KITCHEN TABLE IN THE SUMMER OF 1984. BY 1985 THE NETWORK OFFICIALLY FINISHED ITS' REGISTRATION AND WAS INCORPORATED.

Over the next two years, leading up to our 25th celebration, we will spend time honoring our early champions, reflecting on the past, and remembering those we have lost to HIV and AIDS

DEBRA JAKUBEC, EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR

HIGHLIGHTS FROM THE 2008 HIV EDMONTON ANNUAL REPORT

FUND DEVELOPMENT AND VOLUNTEERS

FUND DEVELOPMENT

Last year saw many exciting changes in Fund Development for HIV Edmonton. At the end of 2007/2008, 74% of HIV Edmonton's revenue came from the single source of contribution agreements. Looking ahead to the agency's future, the board and administration recognized the need to diversify funding sources.

VOLUNTEER PROGRAM

For the past 23 years, HIV Edmonton has been able to provide programs and services to our clients and community because of the dedication, kindness, and compassion of our outstanding volunteers.

In 2008/2009, 332 dedicated volunteers donated 1,473 hours to the cause, allowing us to continue to provide programs and support to those who need it most.

SUPPORT AND OUTREACH

SUPPORT SERVICES

In 2008/2009, HIV Edmonton continued to offer high-quality support services to people living with HIV, their friends and family members, and those at risk. This year the Support and Outreach team saw a drastic increase in the number of clients accessing our services and the number of visits to our office by people requesting support. Over 5,344 people came to our office asking for support.

ROSS ARMSTRONG PROGRAM

The Ross Armstrong Program gives people living with HIV vitamins, hygiene supplies, and a $10 grocery card. This year we had 477 visits to the Ross Armstrong Program.

We also held a summer BBQ and a Christmas dinner. Both were thoroughly enjoyed by all who attended and the Christmas dinner was remarkably successful. With the support of volunteers and the board, we served a traditional turkey dinner to 65 appreciative people.

COMMUNITY EDUCATION

REACHING RURAL COMMUNITIES

Early in 2008, the Alberta Community HIV Fund notified HIV Edmonton that we would receive funding to provide services to the Alberta Health Service areas formerly known as the Aspen and East Central Health regions.

HIV Edmonton provided two-day HIV and AIDS training for eight nurses and sexual health consultants from the former Aspen and East Central regions. HIV Edmonton would like to thank those participants for their collaboration and support in making HIV Edmonton's education programs more accessible to communities across Alberta.

RURAL WORKSHOPS

HIV Edmonton worked with Brian Huskins, educator, advocate, and principal associate of Huskins & Associates Consulting, Inc. to deliver HIV presentations to 11 educational institutions in rural areas surrounding Edmonton.

1,191 grade 9–12 students in rural areas received our workshop

Before the workshop, 44% of rural students reported "fair" knowledge of HIV and AIDS. After the workshop, 72% reported "very good" knowledge of HIV and AIDS.

BODYMAPPING

In the summer of 2008, through the generous support of the Canadian AIDS Treatment Information Exchange (CATIE), The Paint Spot, and the Edmonton Community Adult Learning Association (ECALA), HIV Edmonton volunteers and staff met at a retreat centre in St. Paul, Alberta, to engage in a process known as bodymapping.

Bodymapping, which is also called Living with X, is a unique opportunity for people living with HIV and AIDS to create a very personal self-portrait in a safe, respectful, and welcoming environment. Through a series of exercises and prompts, participants are encouraged to express themselves in a variety of artistic formats resulting in life-size, two-dimensional representations of their bodies and lives.

Bodymapping explores what it is like to be living with HIV. It also explores the unique life experiences of each individual.

INFINITE LIVES

Darren Zenko

You know what's a fun way to spend a beautiful day in July? Hunched over keyboard, mouse and monitor, trying to trick a 13-year-old piece of software into believing a low-end 2008 computer is really a high-end 1997 computer. No, seriously! Get up bright and early, put a pot of coffee on, pop out for a pack of cigarillos, start some downloads, go out and smoke half of one, install, smoke the other half, crash, smoke, patch, smoke, read message boards, smoke, download, smoke, edit config files, test and crash, smoke, tweak, smoke, crash, smoke, test ... and on into the sunset. Nine cigars, smoked by halves, times 10 minutes apiece—that's three full hours of sunshine! Take heed, pasty geeks; abandonware's your ticket to bronzed-god city.

Abandonware. Software of the ancients, digital relics. The artifacts of PC gaming stretching back to the dawn times, the shit-hot machines they were designed to run on now outclassed by phones and toasters, their digital ghosts preserved in shadowy online warehouses and mysterious torrents, playable only through the Ouija voodoo of DOS emulation. Sometimes, though, they're not as abandoned as all that; sometimes their rightful rightsholders, like a great-aunt saying "That old thing? Goodness, I don't see what you're so excited about, but if you want it it's yours," make the files officially available, as Bethesda Softworks did last week with their seminal 1996 open-world RPG, The Elder Scrolls II: Daggerfall. Hence the tan.

It'd be tough to overstate how excited the dungeon-nerd community was over Daggerfall back in the day, at least in concept. The real prototype—I personally count 1994's The Elder Scrolls: Arena as more of a draft or proof-of-concept—for the gameplay that would eventually refine down into Bethesda's masterpieces Morrowind and Oblivion, Daggerfall presented players with 40 million virtual acres of fantastic real estate to explore and/or plunder, 750 000 non-player characters to talk to and/or rob blind, a dynamic political network of guilds and factions to piss off, 10 000 towns and cities to inevitably get chased out of. How a player went about becoming a hero/reprobate was entirely his choice: the game's massive array of character-creation options—stats, skills, spells, classes, advantages and disadvantages—meant that if a character somehow managed to avoid being eaten by grizzly bears in the starter dungeon, it would be custom-tailored to an individual's playing style. This was exciting as all hell.

Of course I never got to play it, "back in the day"; the only people I knew with the multi-thousand-dollar machines that could make that shit run were engineering and comp sci students, and they were all too busy playing Quake and hand-coding Sarah McLachlan tribute websites (complete with then-flashy spinning .GIFs and inline WAVs) to help out a brother who just wanted to spend an hour or two hundred pretending to be a larcenous Legolas. So when I heard through the blogvine that Bethesda was making with the files, it twigged in me the eternal desire of the nostalgist and retro-freak: the desire to have in middle-age that which was denied me in youth.

The computer-game medium has a real problem in terms of archiving and maintaining an accessible canon. Books and other texts can still be read centuries or even millennia after their composition. Conserved or restored, the visual arts remain visible and appreciable. Film and television that survived accidental or thoughtless destruction can still be screened. Even old video games released to arcades and home consoles, their hardware a known quantity that can be emulated, can be re-presented and played today with near-total fidelity. But PC games were and are dependent on a chaotic infrastructure of processors, operating systems, graphics chips, sound cards, devices and drivers, all developed over decades of planned obsolescence. For an old PC game, especially one as resource-hungry and finicky as Daggerfall, to become intelligible to an audience using latter-day machinery requires feats of great geekery.

Thankfully, great geeks are in somewhat plentiful supply, and their discoveries and accomplishments are quickly disseminated and accessible in the online age. Deep into the labyrinth of the crunchiest message-boards I waded, gathering treasure and knowledge at every step. Running Windows XP? Forget it, brother; even if you can get Daggerfall up, it's going to be broken as hell. You need the latest version of DOSBox; get it here. Now you need to fool the game into thinking the file-folder is actually a vintage CD-ROM; mount it with this tool over here. Now you're going to want to edit that config file. Also, this other config file. Here's what to do. That didn't work? Try this. Now type in these commands. Et cetera. Slowly, google by google, command line by command line, smoke by smoke, guided by this disembodied cloud of collective wisdom (some particles of which, honestly, had their disembodied heads up their asses), I converted DFInstall.ZIP from a 500-meg lump of desktop doorstop, to a jaggy, crashy wreck that literally made my computer scream, to something very much like a playable epic fantasy adventure.

> PC games were and are dependent on a chaotic infrastructure of processors, operating systems, graphics chips, sound cards, devices and drivers, all developed over decades of planned obsolescence.

Was it worth it? As a gaming experience, frankly, hell no. Forty million acres ... of bare polygonal hills dotted with tree sprites and filled with random bears. Thousands of towns and dungeons ... Interchangeable towns, interchangeable three-room dungeons. Three-quarters of a million people ... one ten-thousandth of which you might actually want to talk to. I can only appreciate it for what it is—a work of insane ambition, a manifesto, a template for its less "free and open" but more fun, focused and fantastic sequels.

But the 12 hours I spent getting the fucking thing to run? That was fun on a bun. Like gardening, or alchemy. Sometimes getting there is half the adventure, and sometimes, it's all the adventure. V

REVUE // RAZZELLBERRIES

Razz-ma-taz

Razzellberries is a culinary adventure

KELSEY STRODER

Razzellberries Restaurant and Cappuccino Bar, according to the placard outside the restaurant, is "eclectic, drawing from a range of influences including Sri Lankan, Portuguese, Dutch." Intriguing words for what appears to be a simple downtown sandwich shop—but looks can be deceiving.

Arriving after the weekday lunch rush, we approach the front counter to take a look at the "eclectic" offerings. The menu on the wall offers a wide range of typical breakfast and lunch items (burgers, sandwiches, and wraps) and not one item is over $10—perfect for downtown lunch on the go—but not as diverse as I had anticipated.

For the price, the portions are ample and I would definitely return for a quick healthy lunch while in downtown, although I do wish there was more Sri Lankan influence as promised on the placard.

Luckily, as we are leaving, a sign in their window catches my eye; "One month only, Sri Lankan buffet, Saturdays for lunch and dinner, $12.95."

Saturday arrives; I walk in only to find the casual café has morphed into something closer to a restaurant. The tables are covered with tablecloths, and a buffet with enticing-looking items stands adjacent to the counter. We are warmly welcomed and guided over to the delectable-looking buffet by one of the owners who is happy to explain what we will eating for lunch.

The buffet table has a range of items including salmon curry, chicken curry, lentils, green beans with onions and beef with ginger. There are some different condiments to try with the curries, including caramelized onions, browned eggplant and coconut sambol. In Indian cuisine, the prerequisite accompaniment to the meal is naan; for Sri Lankan, we are introduced to two new starchy items: hoppers and string hoppers.

String hoppers are noodles made from rice flour, and are brownish-grey in colour. Initially, I was a little intimated by the big pile of string hoppers at the buffet table as I foresaw an imminent tangle would ensue if I tried to dish them up. However, I was pleasantly surprised that the big mountain consisted of many layers of separate discs of noodles that were easy to get to. I was more impressed with the hoppers, as these were being made fresh by one of the owners at the counter. At the outside of their bowl shape, they are crisp and very delicate. As you work your way into the centre of the hopper you are rewarded with a slightly sweet coconut flavoured doughy centre. Their interesting consistency is due to being made from fermented rice flour which gives the hoppers a light and airy texture. Both varieties of hoppers provided a nice light base to soak up the tasty curries.

Both the chicken and salmon curries were the closest in relation to some East Indian curries I've tasted. The chicken curry reminded me of butter chicken, but where butter chicken is heavy, I found this chicken curry much lighter and spicier. One of my fellow diners who does not annihilate his taste buds with spicy food frequently found the chicken curry quite spicy, whereas I found the heat just to my satisfaction. The salmon was also in a creamy curry base, and was tender and moist. The coconut sambol, in all its spicy, sweet glory was a great match with the salmon curry.

A big hit at our table was the beef with ginger. Sautéed strips of beef were paired with red peppers and a spice base that was heavy on the ginger. It was an unassuming dish that packed a punch when it came to flavour.

As we finished our meals, we made sure to try the dessert Wattalapan. It is a Sri Lankan specialty, and is a steamed pudding made from coconut milk. Toffee-coloured, it is sweet without being overbearingly so. Just like the whole meal, the dessert was unique in its flavours and quite light in its texture.

Razzellberries did finally fulfill its promise of being eclectic. Western and eastern flavours did not necessarily meld, but were well represented in their true form. Although I had to dig a little to get the anticipated culinary world tour, I did not have to dig at all to know that creating quality food is important at Razzellberries. V

Vue's beer guy brews for Edmonton's food fest

TASTE 25
BY ALLEY KAT FOR TASTE OF EDMONTON FESTIVAL
5 TICKETS FOR 341 ML BOTTLE

My job is to write about beer. I keep Vue readers informed of news in the beer industry, review new and interesting beer, and generally tell the stories of the people making their living with beer.

It is not every day when I become the person designing and brewing a beer for sale. In fact until recently it had never occurred. Until I was approached by Jim Pettinger of Sherbrooke Liquor store to design a beer for the Taste of Edmonton, the Churchill Square festival that offers bite-sized samples from Edmonton restaurants. In recent years the festival has expanded to offer a Taste of Wine and a Taste of Beer on the site, which have been highly popular.

As 2009 is the Taste of Edmonton's 25th anniversary, they wanted to do something special to mark the occasion. They came up with the idea of [illegible] a special one-of-a-kind beer exclusively at the Taste of Beer. They had a name right away—Taste 25—but needed a beer to put in the bottle.

This is where Pettinger comes in. Taste arranged with him to produce an exclusive beer, using local micro hero Alley Kat Brewing to craft it. He, for God knows what reason, offered me the opportunity to work with Neil Herbst at Alley Kat to pick the beer style and craft the recipe. Regular readers will know that I am a dedicated homebrewer, so there will be no surprise that I quickly agreed.

After some preliminary discussions with Herbst to decide which style of beer to brew, I picked a recipe from my brew logs I selected a recipe that had served me well over the years, winning a number of medals in homebrew competitions. I expected Herbst to alter the recipe to have it meet professional standards, but he kept it as is, simply scaling it up for volume.

We ended up brewing a steam beer, which is a hybrid style with the cleanliness of a lager and the richness of an ale. It is a fairly bitter beer, but the hops should be balanced with a solid dose of malt. It is a style of beer that goes well with a wide range of food, has substance, yet remains drinkable on a summer day.

I got to lend a hand on brew day. At home I brew about 23 litres per batch. This day we were brewing up 500 litres! As the know-nothing underling, I spent my day mostly doing grunt work: cleaning equipment, measuring out hops, stirring steeping grain. My highlight was when I climbed into the mash tun (the vessel where malt is steeped to extract its sugars) and shoveled out 300 kg of grain into barrels and hauled them outside. It was a blast! Only after did I learn that shoveling grain is the least favourite task at Alley Kat.

Alley Kat handled the rest; fermenting, filtering and bottling. As the process crawled along, my anticipation grew. As did my worry. What if it was lousy? What if my recipe was a dud?

Finally the beer was ready and I received a few advance bottles.

And here is where this column gets awkward. Normally at this point I launch into an account of what I tasted and evaluate the beer. But how can I credibly review my own beer?

So allow me to describe what I find and then leave the evaluation to you. Taste 25 pours burnished gold with bright clarity and offers a thick blanket of white head. The aroma is a blend of soft, rounded malt and sharp, almost woody hoppiness. I also detect a touch of fruitiness.

Upon sipping, it begins on the tip of your tongue with sweetness, a nice rich deep malt flavour that feels German in its character. The beer sharpens and dries out in the middle, ending with a lingering, earthy bitterness.

I will say this: the beer is both clearly mine and not. It is recognizable as my homebrew recipe, yet it exhibits its own qualities. The hop is more assertive, and if anything it is a little cleaner tasting. But it does remind me of my last attempt at this beer.

On whether it is a good example of a steam beer, or, more importantly, an enjoyable quaff on a July afternoon, I will remain silent. I leave that judgment to you. In fact I encourage you to email me to let me know your opinion.

As for how to get the beer there are only two places. From July 17 – 26 it is available at the Taste of Edmonton in Churchill Square, for the price of 5 tickets (which are $1 each). Or if you can't make it downtown you can purchase bottles at Sherbrooke Liquor Store (118 Ave & St. Albert Trail) until supplies run out.

REVUE // MOTHER OF THE YEAR

Mommy near-miss

Chaotic Mother of the Year doesn't quite straighten out its tangled web

WHO'S YOUR MOMMY? >> Shakespeare and soap opera collide in Teatro's latest caper // [illegible]

PAUL BLINOV
// PBLINOV@VUEWEEKLY.COM

Mamma-mia. There's a lot going on in Mother of the Year: given that its reference points are '80s TV dramas and Titus Andronicus, a particularly violent Shakespeare piece, it's hardly surprising that the Stewart Lemoine script is filled with secrets (basically every character has one) and a surprisingly tangled web of sub-plots, even for a large-cast show. It all gets the Teatro comedy caper treatment here, but while the fusion of soap-opera revelations and tragic Shakespearean loss of life is entertaining in Teatro's latest, it doesn't quite add up to the full-on laugh-fest it seems capable of being.

Beginning with the death of a family patriarch, we're dropped into a soap opera world of secret lusts and forbidden connections between two families, each running a rival meat packing company, and a few outsiders, too. It's the '80s, and costume designer Leona Brasen's clearly had fun digging up wigs for the 11-strong cast to traipse around in while becoming romantically entangled and discovering the skeletons in each other's closets.

Coming in the middle of it all is the titular character, Viola Fane, a woman with an [illegible] agenda for power, played with [illegible] gravity by Coralie Cairns. Of course, her plan hardly goes according to well itself; with 10 other characters [illegible] to cheer, mark their own agendas of business, pleasure or revenge, it's a mish-mash of character secrets enhancing or canceling each other's out.

Lemoine's usual strength is weaving a coherent story out of this many threads, and he does so again, albeit with a little too much left to the final scene, where most revelations finally occur, losing a bit of a steam as we get each one after the other.

There seems to be a sense of hesitation, in script and pacing more than acting. Given the slow weave through so many characters and storylines, and transitioning via blackout every time keeps the building energy suppressed—Paul Bezaire's excellent split-level set gets sparsely used as a quick jump between two scenes, but the speed and focus of the swap are noticeably bigger when it happens (in particular, the end of act one, when a split scene hilariously indulges in the soap-opera cliff hanger set-up).

Veering off the rails is part of the equation here, as secrets begin to unravel and the inter-family passions play out in full. But Lemoine (who also directs) keeps a tight rein on the serious/comedy split, never letting things get too carried away, and that controlled energy doesn't always pay off: some of his actors are deadly serious and others a little wackier, but the pairings between the two types (most actors play one or the other) sometimes just leaves a tense energy that hangs without really turning over into comedy. There's punchy moments, but not every situation flies to the heights they seem ready for, relying just on a situation to sell the laugh, without a solid line or two to seal the deal.

Of course, when it works, there's serious fun to be had: Ron Pederson's cop-shaded, troubled brother Carver is a comedic anchor, whose pained voice and shoulder-strutting sell the precise balance of drama and comedy necessary (and the spectres who haunt him later on are possibly the show's highlight). And Jeff Haslam, as always, can dissolve an audience into giggles just by appearing on stage and flashing a face—which he does here, his costume moustache pushing the whole thing into hilarious excess. His villainous figure, obsessed with a genetically fused type of meat, leans furthest into the ridiculous. And Julien Arnold, too, gives it gusto as Granger Haverly, CEO of one company and an always smiling fellow, barely capable of making a sensible speech (which he attempts more than once). It's here, with more ridiculous characters, where Mother of the Year's biggest yields lie. V

PREVUE // THE GABBO SHOW

Gabbo is coming

Collective is hoping to bring back the variety show with one-night extravaganza

GABBO GABBO HEY >> The mysterious puppet emcees a variety show. // Supplied

FAWNDA MITHRUSH
// FAWNDA@VUEWEEKLY.COM

Perhaps people are wanting more bang for their buck these days, or maybe everyone's getting tired of the one-trick-pony acts out there. Either way, the variety show is one vintage concept that's been taken out of the tickle trunk and shined anew. That's what the organizers of the upcoming Gabbo Show believe, anyway.

"From this idea, and stuff I've done with the Dart girls before, I really think that the idea of a variety show is going to make a comeback in the next little while," explains Gabbo spokesperson Kevin Green. (The Dart girls Green speaks of run Catch The Keys—a company that throws all manner of multidisciplinary mash-up parties and shows around town, including the Indie5 show Art on Art, the Wide-Eyed Cabaret, and the Nextfest Nite Clubs.) "People are used to just going to a movie or to a show. It's a really neat form—this is a whole bunch of different stuff and either way you're going to be entertained by some of it."

The night in question will feature a host of comedians from Rapid Fire Theatre's The Chimney Sweepstakes, plus burlesque performances by the Keyhole Kittens. Green also explains that there will be not one, not two, but three bands on rotation during the event.

"The Dark Sand, Sally's Krackers, and Dr. Owlfin Scalpul, we all kind of have the same members," he says. "We thought it would be really fun to do a show where it's not necessarily that one band goes up and plays a set and then another; we wanted to make it more interactive for ourselves, and a little more friendly for the audience. The way we've worked it out is that everyone's basically live at all times."

Essentially, you can show up any time during the evening and still get "a facefull of show," Green, who plays bass for the Dark Sand, promises. "There's going to be a ridiculously accurate cover of 'The Ace of Spades' by Motorhead. The bass player in Dr. Owlfin Scalpul can actually make a mole grow out of his face while he's playing that song," Green says, noting that there will also be a Jackson 5 cover to tribute the spirit of Little Michael, possibly including a Oujia board and conjuring of the dead

Acting as emcee for the whole shebang will be Gabbo himself, who you may recall from his cameo on The Simpsons a few years back. Trevor Duffy, who has been making puppets for the Castledowns variety circuit of late, will be operating the dummy, though not from onstage—Gabbo will appear in 3-feet-tall splendour all by his lonesome, creepy self.

"I find it absolutely fucking terrifying," Green says about working with the puppet, describing Gabbo's debauchery since his animated appearance. "Basically he left his agent and the guy who had his hand up his ass that whole time, he ended up going back to Europe and ran into some troubles. There was some fellatio for money. He ended up back in North America and wandered his way into Edmonton. We ran into him downtown one day, bumming for change. We thought maybe we could use him and he could use us."

Thus the Gabbo Show was born. Confront your fears of ventriloquist dummies while you can. V

Meet Parker

U of Chicago releases reintroduce cold-blooded thief

He has several aliases but only one name, no detectable heartbeat, and, so it seems, not a single significant weakness. Money is typically his sole motivator. He's quirkless and calculated, a logician efficiently eliminating obstacles. He beats women, occasionally—mercifully—killing them. Parker, the protagonist of Richard Stark's long-running series of lean, mean mystery novels, isn't flamboyant or indulgent enough to be a monster, exactly. He has no ideology, no longing for power. (If politics ever entered his mind, he might call himself an anarchist.) A thief by trade and a murderer only when necessary, he claims not to like killing people. A consummate professional, essentially—and in this sense an anachronism held over from Depression-era crime, as his author's confessed—and his professionalism may be the only aspect of his character we could consider redemptive.

Though I knew some of the films adapted from them, including the masterful neo-noir Point Blank, and I'd often heard them praised by discerning fans of the genre, it took me a long time to get around to the Parker novels, partially because many were hard to track down, partially because I couldn't quite fathom how they could be compelling for readers who weren't just sadistic voyeurs. But the University of Chicago Press has recently undertaken a campaign to get Parker back in print in affordable and handsome editions, and I dove in. And now I get it.

Richard Stark was the most successful of numerous pseudonyms attributed to the celebrated novelist and screenwriter Donald Westlake, who died last New Year's Eve at the age of 75.

The first Parker novel was intended as a one-off, a sort of experiment, but his publisher accurately predicted that it would be a hit, and many more swiftly followed. Chicago has so far reprinted the first nine. Let me tell you about the three I've read.

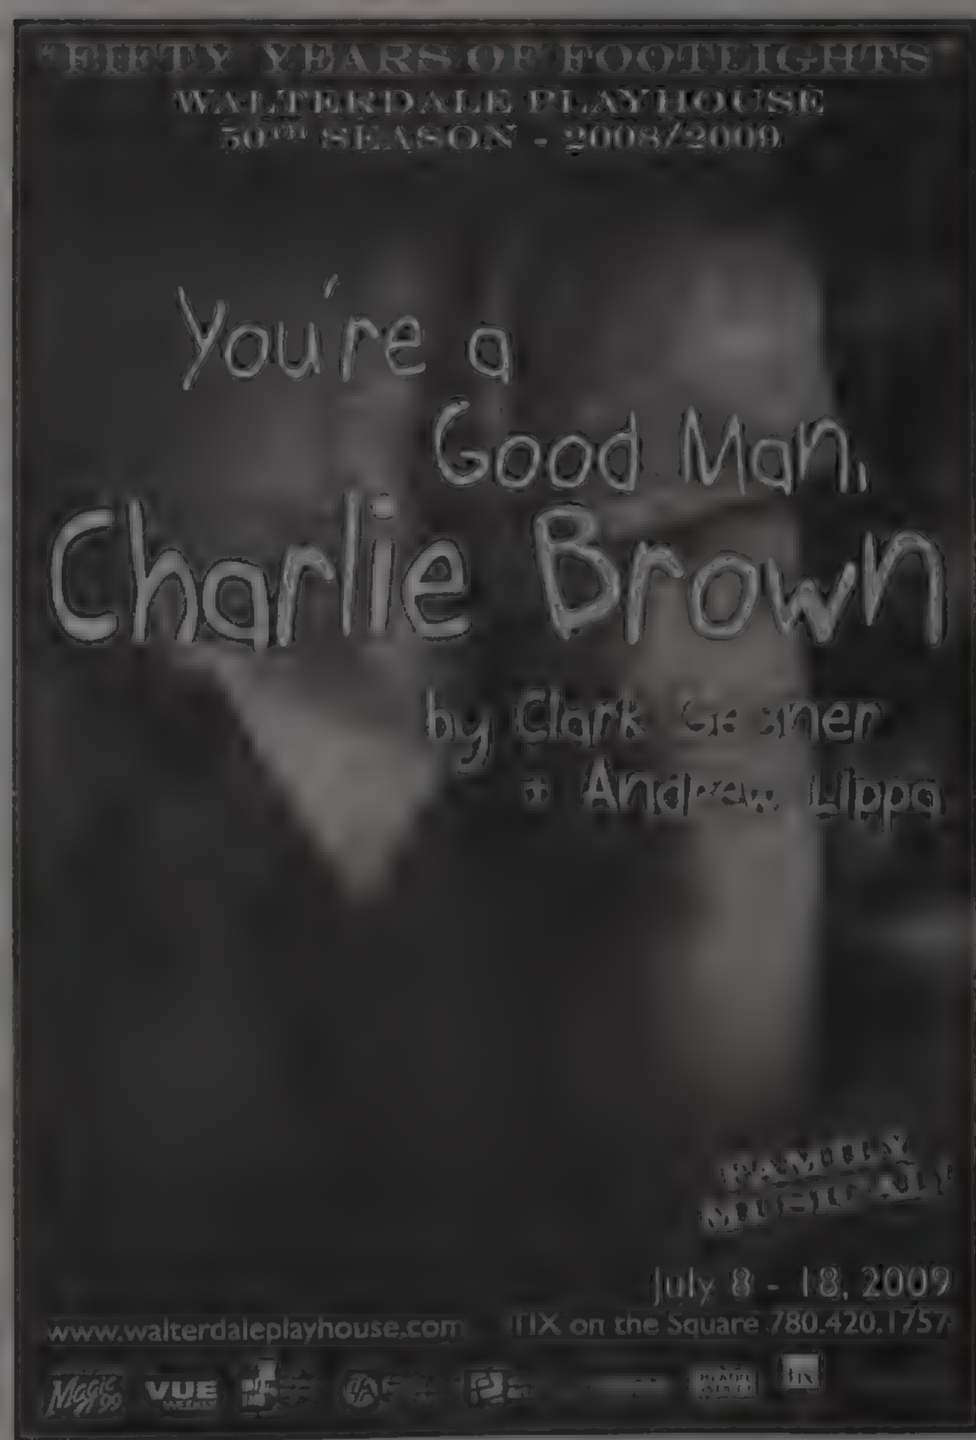
The Hunter, Stark's 1962 debut and the source for Point Blank, introduces Parker in a state of uncharacteristic destitution, walking along a clogged freeway into Manhattan. He spends the first chapter reconstituting himself, quickly building capital through a day's work of fraud and shopping. He's come back from the dead, or close enough. He visits Lynn, the wife who supposedly killed him—the book's first half is in one sense a divorce parable—and will soon pay a visit to the fellow criminal who set it all up. What drives Parker here is pure revenge, a force that renders him—again, uncharacteristically—vulnerable. "He wanted Mal Resnick—he wanted him between his hands. Not the money back. Not Lynn back. Just Mal, between his hands." Of course, given a little time, he'll want the money, too.

The Hunter's more self-consciously hard boiled than later Parkers I've read, emphasizing Parker's rage, his ripping the filters out of cigarettes, his adversaries' nervous stroking of their moustaches. A pang of sexual desire is described as "a knife twisting low in his abdomen," though Parker strictly abstains from humpy-pumpy while working. But when Lynn winds up dead and Parker needs to dispose of her body he completes the act with a telling, prophetic gesture. In slashing her face he's being icily pragmatic, making her death less likely to be made public, but he's also eliminating the visage of the only woman that ever possessed him, and rehearsing the erasure of identity that he'll later seek for himself with an equal lack of sentiment. After, he settles the score with Resnick and single-handedly extorts the national crime syndicate.

By the time of The Mourner in 1963, Parker has bought himself a new face and fully resumed his routine of performing one or two big heists a year and otherwise retiring to some resort under a false name. By now the distinctions in the Stark style are maturing fully: the vivid descriptions of spaces, the Nabakovian wit, the audaciously elliptical structures that toss the reader into the midst of the action without context and, most fascinatingly, the detours into ornate biographical sketches of secondary characters who slowly emerge as pivotal to the plot.

Parker's hired by the father of a lover to steal a statue, one of many originally sculpted to accompany a 15th-century French tomb, but a well-planned job is interrupted by a separate group of criminals who may or may not be after the same thing. Parker forges an uneasy alliance with Menlo, a fat, oddly charming bureaucrat from a tiny Eastern European country under Soviet control. Like Parker's current employer, Menlo's a voluble romantic, and much dry comedy arises from the contrast between Parker's taciturn nature and the rambling narratives these others casually unleash. More silent than all of them however is the titular statue itself, a brilliantly conceived symbol of precisely the sort of emotional release to be found nowhere in the world Parker inhabits, and an ostensible treasure whose owner ironically never even registers its absence.

The Jugger begins with Parker being visited by a cheerful leprechaun from his past just as he turns to the obituary page of the local rag in a hotel room in Sagamore, Nebraska. Parker's here to investigate the suspicious death of Joe Sheer, an old comrade who retired in the town, and the leprechaun, who goes by the name of Tiftus, is just one of several opportunists who crop up with the hope of unearthing Sheer's ostensible buried treasure. Taking Parker out of his milieu and having him on the scene basically to solve a mystery doesn't stop through a labyrinth of greed, and assess some possible damage to his alias' reputation, The Jugger is a virtually perfect little crime story, a rural noir with character to spare and an alignment of theme and action that's both classical and inventive. It was also the first one I read, doing so in anticipation of the belated theatrical and DVD release of Jean-Luc Godard's Made in USA, in which the Parker character's embodied by Anna Karina—surely the only casting that actually stands a chance of one-upping that of Lee Marvin. V



BOOKS // GRAPHIC NOVELS

Drawing in the margins

Drawn & Quarterly keeps pushing the edges of graphic novels

BRIAN GIBSON
// BRIAN@VUEWEEKLY.COM

As a sampling of recent comic stories from Montréal's Drawn & Quarterly shows, graphic novelists from all over the globe keep taking the form beyond its lightly humorous, comic-strip origins, inking twists on those same old stories of growing pains and education from the school of sudden blows. The four here starkly illustrate oppression, longing, pain, ignorance and grief in novel ways. Two in particular are masterfully melancholic.

Pascal Blanchet, from Trois-Rivières, won acclaim with his 2007 debut, the mill-town story White Rapids, and now his second book, the comic-opera Baloney: A Tale in 3 Symphonic Acts (78 pp, $19.95), sees him merge his grandly atmospheric, silhouette and '50s-advertising style with a fatalistic fairy-tale imaginatively scored to Russian composers Prokofiev and Shostakovich. This swelling story of a butcher and his daughter in a clifftop town may seem, at first, to take cuts from Seuss and Fantasia.

But Baloney's part-film, part shadow-play scenes, unfolding rhythmically through text-only, picture-only and blank pages, along with a brilliant mix of black, white and red colours, carve out a slab of magnificent tragedy. It's a retro-looking tale about peasants' struggle against power—in this case, as with White Rapids, literal power, for the Duke runs a heating-company monopoly that oppresses the winter-bound town. Yet this dark fantasia manages to not only inhabit a darkly whimsical world but make you hear the music to which it is to be scored ("Brass for arrogance and cruelty" and "Clarinets for calm" in Act II).

NOVEL COMICS >> Drawn and Quarterly's graphic novels continue to innovate // Supplied

In 2008, Israel's Rutu Modan drew attention with Exit Wounds, an award-winning comic-story of two strangers meeting in Tel Aviv in the wake of a street-bombing. Her search for style and subject matter that hits home is showcased in a collection of earlier work, Jamilti & Other Stories (174 pp., $19.95), now translated and released here. The earliest pieces, as Modan admits in her afterword, seem remote. From a serial-killer story to a slightly gothic tale of three girls running a theme hotel, the drama is sometimes rushed and obvious, even a little too easy.

Modan notes her preoccupation with family photos, and it's no coincidence that the unforced, observational, snapshot feel, along with the clean lines and photographic look of Exit Wounds, emerge in "Homecoming" and "Jimalti," when she's turning the camera on her own surreal land. The juxtaposition of romantic memory and terrorist threat isn't quite perfected at the end of the kibbutz tale "Homecoming," but the title story, beautifully and horrifically matching up a suicide bomber and an imploding engagement, closes with a perfect jab. So does the last and most recent tale, "Your Number One Fan" (a look at that particularly Israeli sense of forced solidarity), with a musician finding himself too hopeful for a big break.

The maturity in Diane Obomsawin's Kaspar (82 pp., $15.95) is not only true but more incredible. Her cartoon-figure drawings are as unsophisticated as foundling Kaspar Hauser himself, left by his mother to a man who kept him in a room until his mid-teens, teaching him only a few words and how to walk (awkwardly) before leaving him in the middle of Nuremberg in 1828. He's super-sensitive (his eyes hurt when he cries) and thinks "People are watching us" as he stands before a mirror with his first adoptive mother.

Obomsawin, an animator and illustrator raised in France and based in Montréal, makes Kaspar like a slowly developing artist, learning about perspective (he's amazed not to be crushed by the point where a road meets the horizon) and distance (he thinks the moon is "the sun pasted onto the night"). His still-life watercolour, reproduced here, is gorgeous (though would have been more startling in colour, amid Obomsawin's grayscale frames), but it's Kaspar's own still-life that haunts. He dreams of death and strange assailants attempt to kill him, one finally succeeding in 1833.

Obomsawin's minimalist history (she's sifted through many sources, including Kaspar's own writings, and added some of her imaginings) falters a little as Kaspar is educated; his life with various tutors rushes by and the minimalist drawings mean that the detail of bourgeois German houses and estates, which must have overwhelmed and perplexed this near-blank slate of a young man, is missing. The clashes of nature and culture, of an awed man-child and hardened adult society, could be darkened, and many of the questions about Hauser on the back cover aren't raised within. But if Kaspar, like the man himself, offers a less than full and satisfying history, it can be more than just a short, stunted storyboard of a life, sometimes flickering a simple, powerful light on an educational enigma.

Pascal Girard, now in Québec City, recalls his grief-addled childhood in Jonquière with the death of his younger brother. Nicolas (69 pp., $11.95) moves along the pages from moment to mood without borders, the young Pascal showing off a picture of his dead brother to a classmate one day, sobbing darkly in his bed the next, then worrying about children with his girlfriend in an instant of a decade later. With the spare faces, this looks like a Calvin & Hobbes or Peanuts comic strip, only more flecked with a deeply inward, existential searching. But it's also awfully, wonderfully honest. This mini-masterpiece starts and ends with Pascal's memory of him and Nicolas playing with childish abandon. It's a haunting coda for a "little book" that only grows bigger in its emotions and shows just how successful graphic novels can still be in their outsized ambitions. V

BOOKS // POETRY

Poet Canada

Trio of poets offer differing takes on landscape and language

ROBIN DUNFORD
// ROBIN@VUEWEEKLY.COM

The opening lines of Tim Bowling's The Book Collector (80 pp, $16.95, Nightwood) tell us, "It's a new world" but, as the businessman sips his "green tea to display his globalism," we know where we're going—back to the familiar waters of Bowling's beloved Fraser River: "it begins, / another salmon run .. / Several million sockeye hang at the mouth, / a swarm at the entrance of the hive, / turning their hunger inland, all feeding done."

And the question becomes: is the salmon a metaphor for Bowling himself? Is his feeding done, his feeding off his past as a fisherman in the wilds of BC? Bowling, who recently won the prestigious Guggenheim, became Canada's bard only after years of writing poetry collections—and a work of non-fiction, The Lost Coast: Salmon, Memory and the Death of Wild Culture—about his longing for this fading world. But you get the sense from this collection that the old salmon runs of his youth have spawned imagery Bowling cannot easily or willingly escape—he's trapped in a knitted loop that keeps hooking him back to the coast even as he lives the urbanite's life in land-locked Edmonton. His speaker's a husband and father who hangs out at rep cinemas which show The Seven Samurai and yet, in "Cineaste," the scene always cuts to the "Sound of salmon striking a net."

In "The Return," the salmon overtakes the speaker, torturing him as his wife and children look on: "I can't get out of bed this morning. / It isn't what you think ... / Simply, I'd become a tributary of the Fraser River / and the last wild salmon / had chosen my body in which to dig her redd." He seems on the verge of release or new maturity like the salmon of his seas.

Though I sometimes found myself crossing out stanzas, yearning for a more disciplined distillation, especially of his characters—such as a Jesus-like brother in "1972" and an outcast schoolmate in "The Soccer Players"—I still recommend The Book Collector for the generosity of its vision and because even a slightly rambling Bowling is more poetic than most, even if tormented and dragging "the cracked mirrors of salmon up the gangway of an uncherished place ... see[ing] himself,/a thousand deceptions/on the condemned surfaces of life."

In sharp contrast, rob mclennan, who was the 2007-08 writer-in-residence at the U of A, comes out of a tradition of urban experimental verse that isn't for the faint of heart. Even though his latest collect is called gifts (160 pp, $18.95, Talonbooks), this work can't be described as generous.

In his offerings, mclennan juxtaposes words and phrases in an effort to find new combinations that are incomplete, weightless and, as the back-cover blurb explains, "frees the signifier from the signified." Although there are some fresh lines here—"like he does / speaks death-rattle soft / a wind-shook path & sunk / about as then; through uncolonized boundaries"—for the most part I find this attempt to unhinge words from meaning an eye-crossing, skin-scratching pain. "a smoke signal for derek," for instance, grates: "where endless nights & bryan camps / the mines go wild; costume / if you see the state; pretend, & thanks, thumbs".

While reading the lovely "a valentine for lea," though, I discovered that the poems work better while read aloud and there's an unexpected pleasure in listening to his verse on the tongue. The lines even begin to make momentary sense until I get to the final stanza: "why dont you wish the white pacific? why dont you wish the corridor?" Say again?

mclennan is suspicious of connections, conjunctions, even of completion. Part of the reason for the confusion is his resistance to "ands" and "buts" and "ifs." Even his semi-colons and commas are left to drift in space, calling attention to themselves. A poet like this is oceans apart from Bowling's anchored imagery.

But a word of warning: these are poems to be read intermittently, not one after the other on a long night (as I did with the other two collections). Only then can you shake the feeling that gifts is luring you from the fringes of a private party of masturbatory PhDs. If you can refrain from taking the exclusion personally (or if you're willing to work hard and read Derrida), you just might appreciate mclennan's strange music and find joy and challenge in someone else's valentine for someone else's special occasion.

Red Deer-based Joan Crate's third collection, the blandly titled subUrban Legends (82 pp, $16.95, Freehand), is a lyrical revising of the Snow White fairy tale and of the speaker's childhood tales of loss (her mother the Queen in childbirth), abandonment (her father the King), and escape (an abusive Prince Charming who met her at the altar). This is the most well-crafted and disciplined collection of the three, even if the writing is at times less purely poetic as it weaves its wicked story for us—in interlocking frames that sometimes soar to a lovely pitch and sometimes drop to prose chopped up.

This collection looks into the mirror, mirror on the wall to find the speaker's archetype, Snow White, as her unconscious. Her childhood feelings are the seven helpful dwarves. Crate expertly navigates past and present, trekking through the dead of winter, which she tries to "forgive" with lines every Albertan can appreciate—"something murderous / lives in this climate, lingers in the corners of gardens and mouths, /freezes the delicate language of birth." Finally she finds spring ("You and I listen / small and silent as seeds") and summer-on-the-verge-of-fall where the speaker and Snow White finally reconcile "injuries and questionable decisions." The speaker conjures Snow White—"All I need is a bite of childhood" /(rosy-red, half-poisoned)"—as a vessel for her addictions, pain, and depression. And one doesn't need to know Freud or Derrida to understand what the poet's doing when she brings Snow White in from the Alberta cold so August might come to baptize her as she, like her magpies, finds "nourishment in what's left over." DOCUMENTARY // FOOD, INC.

Fact farm

The message isn't new, but the visuals make Food, Inc. a gut-turning documentary

JOSEF BRAUN
// JOSEF@VUEWEEKLY.COM

Movies make us hungry. They can also make us disgusted. They can bypass rational thinking and make us desperate to eat things we normally wouldn't stomach. They can take the consumption of food and render it either into gastronomical pornography or body horror. Primo and Secondo whip up a spectacularly succulent feast in Big Night; the man in the white suit cracks eggs over his mistress' naked flesh in Tampopo; Divine eats shit in Pink Flamingos; Harrison Ford works a glazed donut and sunglasses into hot sex with Lena Olin in Hollywood Homicide; Bob and Doug McKenzie drown in beer in Strange Brew; the little zombie girl feasts on her own mom in Night of the Living Dead. Make your own list, the point is that moving images of eating prompt responses in us that other media can't, and that's the primary reason why, despite lame graphics and excess compression, I feel compelled to recommend the straight-ahead activist Food Inc. so highly.

There are other, more thorough methods of gaining this information, but few possess the promise of inciting such immediate action from such a potentially large audience.

Helmed by TV history doc veteran Robert Kenner, Food Inc. comes out swinging, with every well-calculated punch directed at the corporate takeover of American food—and, by extension, our food—and what all evidence points to as a rigorously enforced policy of closed doors and diversion tactics that usually manifest in a veneer of pastoral serenity. Images of sunrises, freshly painted barns and happy, healthy cows grazing across a lush expanse of grass are a façade for, among other things, Frankenstein factory farming, shamefully lax disease control measures, seed patents and, obviously, appalling cruelty to animals, not to mention humans, since labour exploitation—there are allegations of big food in cahoots with US Immigration—is key to industry mechanics.

The fact that so much in Food Inc. seem shocking to audiences is

DVD >> MADEA GOES TO JAIL

Diary of a savvy Black man

Tyler Perry's unique mix of melodrama and comedy speaks to a very specific audience

If you ignore his actual films themselves, Tyler Perry is probably the most interesting American filmmaker today. You could probably write a book on what his runaway success means about the African-American experience in the United States, but I'll try to summarize the major points. The most relevant information to begin with is that Perry is a southern, African-American playwright who found pretty huge success with a touring series of occasionally musical plays revolving around the world of Mabel "Madea" Simmons, a sass-talking black grandma—her nickname is evidently the southern Black equivalent of Nana/Baba—with a hair-trigger temper, played by Perry himself in Big Momma's House-level drag. Perry's franchise grew even bigger when he turned his plays into films: his breakthrough, Diary of a Mad Black Woman, was made for just over $5 million US and grossed 10 times that. His latest Madea Goes to Jail just released on DVD, made $90 million, and was the number one film in America its opening weekend.

The really interesting part is that Perry has achieved all this with absolutely no support from Hollywood—Lionsgate Films is his distributor, but he makes them entirely with his money, through Atlanta-based Tyler Perry Studios, America's largest independent film studio—and despite the fact critical reaction is tepid at absolute best. And I don't just mean actual critics, though they've hardly been kind: even his ratings on a site like IMDB rarely crack a five, this from a site that rates the Transformers sequel a fairly solid 6.5. Probably what that means, though, is that not a lot of black people use IMDB.

See, his trick is that he speaks—powerfully—to a market that's almost entirely ignored by the major entertainment companies: Christian, middle-class African-Americans (now might be a good time to point out that, despite their success, a Perry movie has never actually opened at an Edmonton theatre, and for that matter rarely makes much money at all beyond US borders). His films are a really sort of bizarre mixture of what I can only really call sassy Black comedy—that Martin Lawrence reference wasn't for nothing—and treacly Christian morality plays that are kind of stunning in their simple dichotomies. How exactly those fit together so seamlessly in some minds is slightly beyond me, but then these are very specifically, literally African-American films, a culture I don't exactly have a lot of touchstones in common with (it's worth pointing out, again, that this is one that basically has nothing in the way of pop-cultural exposure, neither as materialistic and rampantly testosterone-y as mainstream hip-hop nor as acerbically political as Spike Lee).

The combination is, if nothing else, pretty utterly unique. Mixture might not actually be the right word: it's not as though one informs the other or their sensibilities fuse. More accurately, broad comedy and moral melodrama are fused together, their separate parts as visible as different patches on a quilt. So, then, in Madea Goes to Jail, we get the basically unprecedented experience of a joke about a Hispanic serial killer offing 18 men—to Madea's amused approval—juxtaposed with some really serious, heavy-on-the-Jesus attempts to get a junkie-prostitute off the street. The two are offered up so blindly, the apparent contradictions so incredibly ignored, you start to wonder if Perry is actually literally schizophrenic, or at least if he bothers to read his scripts all the way through.

But that's just kind of the way of the movie. Its melodramatic side follows a young lawyer's (Derek Luke) attempts to save the aforementioned prostitute (The Cosby Show's—one of the few cultural precedents for Perry, though really not the same thing at all—Keshia Knight Pulliam) in the face of a comically (unintentionally, natch) callous fiancé. Like, as in, this woman is staring at her fiancé taking care of a junkie going through withdrawal—a junkie who is a childhood friend of her fiancé, also—and starts bitching about how he never pays that kind of attention to her(!!). Because, in Perry's world, bad people have to be entirely morally bankrupt, the fiancé will eventually doctor up charges and get the prostitute thrown in jail for 17 years.

The comedic side of things is taken up by Madea, whose vicious temper—she pulls what's evidently a machine gun on uninvited party guests and trashes a parking-spot-thief's car with a forklift, all of this presented with a kind of tee-hee-ain't-she-a-big-sassy-black-woman vibe—lands her in anger management with Dr. Phil (Oprah's another decent cultural precedent, though with a much wider appeal) and eventually the slammer. There's also a certain degree of comic relief due to her slightly dim-witted family, mostly in the form of Black pop-cultural references, winks at the fact Madea is actually a dude in drag and exhortations for Madea to go to church.

Despite the fact she's not a churchgoer, Madea does have a pretty unfailing sense of morality, which comes into full play in the relatively brief prison scenes, and is of the take-responsibility-for-yourself variety. That there seems to be the thread that joins the two halves together, and ultimately explains a big part of Perry's appeal to his particular audience: for a group that has pretty much literally worked its way from the ghetto to the suburbs, it's a pretty self-affirming message, though delivered a little too simply to transcend its intended target. FANTASY // HARRY POTTER AND THE HALF-BLOOD PRINCE

Not half bad

The latest Harry Potter seems pretty adequate, for the most part

I'M THE WIZ >> Harry Potter and the Reasonably Entertaining Sixth Installment

DAVID BERRY

Full disclaimer: despite seven books and five previous movies over 12 years of sales records and relentless hype, I'm a Harry Potter neophyte. It's nothing particular I have against the series, it's just one of those world-enough-and-time issues. But so: my entire exposure to Harry Potter previous to watching Harry Potter and the Half-Blood Prince was Wikipedia and the inevitable newspaper articles that would pop up every time a book was released, detailing the fanatical devotion children and older people who should maybe find more constructive outlets for fanatical devotion have to the series. This felt like a neccessary disclaimer.

So, then, as not just a non-fan but someone who is categorically ignorant of the phenomenon, I can say without prejudice that the film version Half-Blood Prince is resoundingly OK. Far too long for its own good—of all the films that should stretch into the two-and-a-half hour realm, popcorn blockbusters really are just slightly ahead of teen sex comedies—and with an attendant pacing and structure that feel pretty perfunctory, but lighthearted and effects-laden enough to not completely crush you.

It opens with a flat-out exhilarating shot—for a man who has chiefly [illegible] on television, director David Yates is pretty good with grandiose, dramatic camera effects—as we swoop along with a gang of Voldemort's Death Eaters (fellow neophytes: Wikipedia) as they wreak havoc on London. Sadly, [illegible] all the energy Half-Blood Prince has to give: not long after, we'll have slowed down to a leaden plod, as we go over what surely must be every plot point the book has to offer, running time and interest levels be damned.

The two major threads here concern the impending assassination of Harry's mentor Dumbledore (a quite-charming Michael Chabon) and Harry and friends maturing into fully fledged hormonal teenagers, and it shouldn't be surprising that the former proves a lot more interesting than the latter. The first steps of love here are played almost entirely for easy laughs at the characters' awkwardness, which is a little bit cute before it turns grating, something that maybe worked in the context of a book's psychological insights but just serves to add flab to the film (though Rupert Grint, easily the most charming of the young actors [illegible] does a decent job of comic relief).

Maybe it's just because I'm an abstainer, but a lot of the problem here seems to be that screenwriter Steve Kloves felt the need to include everything, which leads to a simultaneously clipped and clunky pace, and a film that kind of just traipses from scene to scene without much in the way of dramatic build-up. There are enough action sequences in between to keep things sort-of lively, but again, they're basically just set pieces, flashy visual bookmarks that dazzle and then drift away.

That said, Yates deserves credit for his visual punch, and anything crammed with this many big-name British actors is never going to be a complete loss, even if the vets just serve to underscore how one-note most of the kids (or, well, young adults) in the series are. It doesn't exactly justify the hype for a newcomer, but the fans at the midnight screening seemed to enjoy it, although I also think it's fair to say that folks who lined up two hours before the movie started don't exactly make for the most discriminating of audiences. ▼

Blogging's not just for geeks

SIMON BATTLEY

The founder of Vancouver-based music-publicity company Killbeat Music, Ken Beattie knows a thing or two about creating a relationship between artists and their audience. In an age where an album can be put together in GarageBand in a studio apartment on a Monday and be available for download on iTunes by Wednesday, Beattie says that at this point artists need to be cultivating the kind of personal connections with their audiences that blogs can provide or they risk becoming quickly irrelevant.

"It's really hard for bands to get attention--there's so many bands. It's a lot easier to make a record than it was years ago, so there's thousands of releases a week," he says, explaining that a direct connection to a fanbase puts a band at an advantage in terms of getting its music heard. "That was always important—that's why you went on the road: to connect with your fans. That's why at a merch table you'd have an email list: so you could contact people next time you're coming to town. I think there's always been that desire for artists to connect to their fans directly and now it's even easier than before."

Of course, it's not just enough to have a blog—people need to be reading it or it's just a tree falling in the forest. So what does an artist have to do to get their blog read? Beattie says that the most important thing is content—daily entries are best, if you can hack it—but that patience is a key virtue in building up a fanbase. Creating a community doesn't happen overnight.

"Really it's word of mouth," he says. "You might read the Fucked Up blog and then you might write about it on a known blog that people are going to all the time and people might read about it there and then they start going to this person's blog. I think it starts small and then builds from there.

"It's like anything—once something becomes known as a really good blog or [one with] good entries or really good stories, you're able to tell so many people in such a short amount of time that it's really easy to make it grow."

When it comes to the artists on Killbeat's roster, Beattie and his colleagues have a pretty firm plan for helping to facilitate the connection between artist and audience via social media.

"We tell them to have some kind of video that they can put on their MySpace page, or on their Facebook page. We're encouraging everyone to be on Facebook, we're encouraging everyone to be on Twitter, we're encouraging everyone to blog as often as they can—especially when they're on tour—not just on their own blog, but we'll also go out and ask someone like Exclaim! or another site if they'll host the tour blog while they're on tour," he explains. "We just tell them you have to be more and more involved. You have to engage your fans, you have to make a personal connection."

And in the past few years, as social media has gained more and more ground amongst artists and audience, Beattie has seen its use make a significant difference for those artists who use it well.

"It absolutely makes a difference," he says. "When you show up in that town there's a bunch of people that show up that you've already kind of talked to or have already been following you—they feel like they know you. They feel like they know you because they know what you had for dinner three nights ago. It intensifies the relationship." V

Here it is: Vue Weekly's eighth annual musician's directory. As usual, we've compiled a pretty massive list of Edmonton's musicians—both solo performers and groups—but this year we've made an effort to include as many helpful contacts as possible for anyone looking for anything from a venue to play at to a place to pick up some equipment. Remember, too, you can always find updated listings on the web at vueweekly.com/emd all year long.

EQUIPMENT

Step 1: job delivering newspapers.
Step 2: buy a ton of equipment.
Step 3: get yourself some gigs.

MERCHANDISE

This is a pretty self-explanatory category. You want T-shirts, you've got to get them made. Same with records, tickets and anything else that you can't or don't want to do in your basement.

Alberta Morning with Tony King
Weekdays, 6 - 9 am

How did you get started in radio?

After my life-changing discovery of music in high school, I worked in commercial radio, then strayed to university for a degree in art and design. But the radio bug called me back.

What do you love about being at CKUA?

Since starting at CKUA, I have come to appreciate an incredibly wide array of music from all different genres. I have sat down to tea with artists such as Ron Sexsmith, Roy Forbes, Greg Keelor, Buck 65, Sue Foley and a host of others.

Any words of wisdom?

I consider all of life's experiences an education that I bring to the air every morning.

BANDS

BLUES / JAZZ

Chris Andrew
Jazz
Although well known as a jazz educator in Alberta, Chris is best known for his ability to play in the jazz vein. Chris has performed or recorded with numerous well-known groups including the Jump Orchestra, Maracujah, Bomba, Kelly Allana, Tim Tamashiro, the Swinging Bovines, the Edmonton Symphony, Phatty and the Devoties. Chris spent the first half of 2005 as the musical director for the Decidedly Jazz Danceworks show ¡BULLA!, in which the song "3 Corners of Emotion" from the Hutchinson Andrew Trio was featured. Chris has recently been honoured with the 2008 CBC Galaxie Rising Star Award for his virtuosic talent.

Don Berner Trio
Jazz
Juno Award-winner PJ Perry calls Don Berner "one of Canada's fastest-rising saxophone stars"; Berner has appeared alongside notable jazz luminaries and in jazz clubs throughout North America. A former MacEwan College Outreach instructor, he maintains a busy performing, workshop-leading and teaching schedule. He's made regular appearances with the Edmonton Symphony Orchestra, played embassies worldwide, performed on Hockey Night in Canada and other radio and TV specials.

Bobby Cameron
Blues
Canadian guitar wizard Bobby Cameron is best known as a superbly skilled guitar player with a powerful, emotional style. Yet at the heart of his ever-evolving career is a true singer-songwriter. He is an [illegible] live performer, whether on his charismatic solo shows or fronting his energetic roots-rock band. With his soul anchored in his Cape Breton upbringing, Cameron brings to his music a riveting mix of styles, running the full gamut from folk and roots right up to blues and rock.

Kat Danser
Blues
Kat throws down an acoustic fusion of funky, laidback rhythms and thought provoking lyrical poetry. Her "swamp blues" style is delivered on the waves of her deep, resonant vocals and the soulful voice of her Weissenborn lap slide guitar. She is one part juke joint, one part plow puller and two parts dusty ol' canvas tent revival. Kat has won recognition nationally and internationally for her work and was a Western Canadian Music Award nominee for Outstanding Blues Recording in 2007. She serves up a refreshing approach to roots blues and gospel music in the 21st century.

Elphida Trio
Jazz/funk
Elphida Trio started out trying to be the next Oscar Peterson trio. After performing a handful of shows they found they had more connection to the crowed when they would do free-form, fully-improvised funk jams. This led them to concentrate more on a music style influenced by such masters as Chick Corea, Jaco Pastorius, Michel Camilo and Medeski Martin and Wood, as well as jazz luminaries Oscar Peterson and Dave Holland's many projects. This revelation means shows consist of odd-time originals, covers by the afore mentioned artists, improvised jams and some jazz standards.

The Jim Findlay Trio
Jazz
Jim Findlay guitar, Cam Neufeld violin, Michael Williams bass. We are a mixed jazz trio and do pieces from all genres. The creative edge is paramount but we tailor our selections to suit the venue and listeners. We can get outside the boundaries with modern jazz or do a swing tune. When requested we have additional musicians and vocalists we work with. We are available for any situation requiring good music: corporate, arts groups, galleries, private parties, special events, clubs and restaurants.

Hot White Noise
Indiejazzrock
Hot White Noise is a group of six members sharing duties on piano, trumpet, saxophone, guitar, bass, drums and auxiliary percussion. They create a pleasant cacophony of melodious dissonance and consonant harmony, all the while exchanging instruments every other song. With perceptible influences ranging from Latin jazz to electronic pop, these young songsters cover the musical spectrum without resorting to any clichés.

George Koufogiannakis
Jazz guitarist
Canadian jazz guitarist George Koufogiannakis has been performing, producing and touring across Canada for more than 20 years and has appeared on dozens of recordings. George recently returned to Canada after some time abroad in the United Kingdom where he completed his MMus Degree in Jazz Performance. He has now settled back in the Edmonton area where he continues to teach, act as a clinician, produce and perform.

Marshall Lawrence
Blues
Marshall Lawrence, "Doctor of the Blues," performs acoustic slide, delta and fingerstyle blues. His playing is steeped in roots music and has a true and genuine blues feel. His throaty vocals remind you of sitting in a smoky gin joint in the '30s and '40s listening to the true blues masters. Marshall's pounding rhythms and fierce attack on guitar transforms each song into raw emotion. Marshall has established himself as a force on the Canadian blues scene, releasing two CDs—2003's Where's The Party? and 2008's The Morning After—to wide critical acclaim. Marshall Lawrence is sure to summon up the Blues to fix whatever ails you!

Mad Dog Blues Band
Blues
The Mad Dog Blues Band combines 150 years of experience into one unique sound. The group blends a mixture of blues, southern rock and rockabilly and peppers its shows with originals and "Mad Dogged" arrangements of blues standards. Definitely the band to listen to for your fix of blues with an Alberta flavour.

Slowburn
Blues
"The blues is life" as Brownie McGhee put it. Slowburn loves to play the blues —all forms. You can't help but get up and dance. One of the hardest-working blues bands in Alberta. We even throw in a bit of blues-drenched rock. Clubs, pubs, soft seaters, weddings, Christmas events, special events, corporate functions, all types of events. Covers and originals.

Trocadero Orchestra
Jazz
Composed of long-time professional jazz musicians, our 17-piece group has been performing to packed houses for over a decade now. We're in solid demand for private events, weddings, corporate parties, as well as our own popular public dinner/dance nights.

Ann Vriend
Jazz/pop/rootsy soul
Ann's blend of originality with pop sounds is comparable to innovators such as Kate Bush, Regina Spector, Sarah Slean and Feist. Her literary, poetic lyrics have likened her to Leonard Cohen and Paul Simon, and her honest voice shows hints of Dolly Parton's clear, direct heartbreak and Aretha Franklin's stunning, exquisite soul.

Bands on the blog

Social media makes music more personal, participatory

BRYAN BIRTLES
// BRYAN@VUEWEEKLY.COM

It's the desire for a personal connection that draws a person into music—the feeling that the singer in the band is talking about your life, your problems, your desires. While that interest in a personal connection—even just a perceived one—has long been a part of popular music, in recent years the Internet has changed the relationship between musicians and their audience from one that may have felt personal into one that actually is.

In the seemingly endless debate over whether the Internet is going to lead to the death or the renaissance of the music industry, one aspect that is often overlooked is the personal connection that has become possible through the medium—the Internet was, after all, a tool created to facilitate communication, not one meant to give you access to all the albums you want for free. From email lists and websites created on clunky, template-based platforms like Geocities or Tripod to MySpace pages, Twitter accounts and blogs, bands and musicians have long been at the forefront of utilizing available technology as a means for more direct and personal communication with a potential audience.

Blogs are perhaps the most effective tool available right now for facilitating this kind of new, intimate relationship between bands and audience. Whereas a website or a MySpace page have more permanence within the impermanent web—that is, they generally feature relatively stable information such as an official bio, some promo photos, maybe a few cuts off the latest album—blogs are transitory, changing from day to day, even hour to hour. The style of communication inherent in a blog is more conversational, and comment functions imbue the site with a back and forth between band and audience, also creating the potential for a community amongst people who read and comment on the blog.

> The reason we have a blog or a website or even try to communicate on the Internet is so that people can know about us, get interested in us.

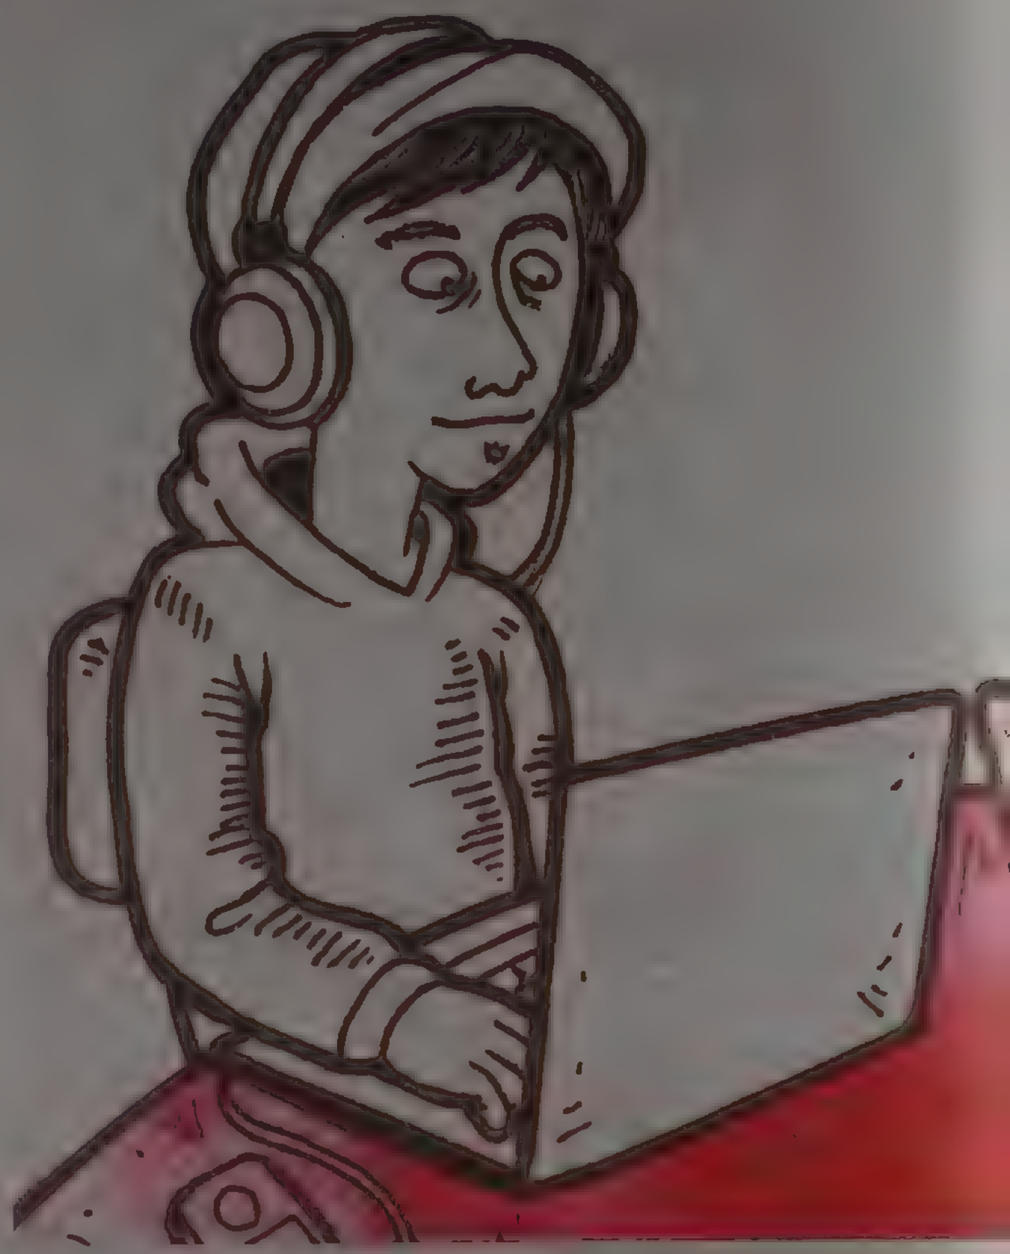
One of the more innovative blogs available to music fans is Looking For Gold, the semi-official home of Toronto-based hardcore band Fucked Up. Run by guitarist Mike Haliechuk, Looking For Gold posts not only the experiences of the band while on tour, but links to articles about the band, posters from shows, alternative versions of songs it has released and demos that Fucked Up is working on.

"A blog by nature is supposed to be more confessional and I think it just gives you a different relationship with your content if you have a blog," explains Haliechuk. "A lot of time a band website will be really static—you'll update tour dates every couple of weeks or something but otherwise everything stays the same. I think it's cool that our band website changes every couple of days."

Perhaps the strangest thing about Fucked Up's blog is that it functions as the band's only official presence on the web. In three years of running the blog, Fucked Up has never had an official website or MySpace, nor does Haliechuk feel the band needs one. What started as a solution to not being able to program HTML and not wanting to relinquish control of the band's Internet presence to someone else has turned into a perfect solution.

"I would have gotten a website if I knew how to do it, and we would get a MySpace if we thought we needed one. We don't have a crusade against those things or anything," Haliechuk says. "We just have a website and I think it works pretty well."



TIMELINE >> PERSONAL CONNECTIONS

1949 | 1960 - 1970 | 1981 | 1994

Haliechuk's commitment to content for the blog is what sets it apart, though he shrugs off the suggestion that he's doing anything particularly innovative.

"We're a band, we write songs and make records so that people can hear about them, you know? So the reason we have a blog or a website or even try to communicate on the Internet is so that people can know about us, get interested in us," he says. "I just want people to come and read it so I try and put up as much information as possible."

There are any number of ways to run a band blog, however. For Edo Van Breemen, pianist and vocalist of Vancouver's Brasstronaut, his band's blog functions in a similar fashion to many other blogs—posting cool stuff Van Breeman has found while traipsing around the Internet—as well as a band blog—posting tour dates and updates about what the band is up to while recording or touring. For Van Breemen, the personal connection being made with the band's audience is important because the more you know about the band, he feels, the more you can get into the music.

"I think it just gives you some insight into the personality behind the music and for this band it's really important because we're not trying to make technical music for the sake of making technical music, I think we're just trying to make really good soul music and music that makes us feel good and music we can have fun playing over and over again, so I think our personalities have a lot to do with it," he says.

For Van Breemen, then, the decision to fill his blog with things that interest him and that he wants to share instead of talking about his own band constantly was a conscious one. In his mind, he explains, all of that band stuff will get out through other forms of media—it's the deep personality of the band members that can be best transmitted through the direct communication offered by having a blog.

"For me it's more interesting to read a band blog that reveals personality traits of the musicians that wouldn't otherwise be exposed in traditional print or online interviews," he says. "It's a very fun atmosphere when we hang out together so I guess I wanted to reveal that a bit."

While a blog by a band you already know and like might be more interesting than one by a lesser-known group, social media is still a good way to connect a band to potential fans. Plenty of bands book tours and some sign record deals through MySpace demos alone, and British band Ok Go's treadmill video went viral, bringing millions of eyeballs and ears to the little-known group. But not everyone has such an easy time—for most, using a blog to get a name out is the same as touring: a slow build.

A first tour is often a painful process full of empty venues, little money for gas, bad food and no places to stay. But as time goes on, and with persistence, that can change. The same is true of a blog. While no one will read your initial posts, keeping at it and working to get the message out will bring people to it. In fact the two can work in tandem—touring will introduce a band to new audiences, while the blog keeps them informed when the band is not there, and gets the audience excited for the group's return.

For Vancouver band Said the Whale, whose guitarist Tyler Bancroft does most of the blogging, Twittering and Facebook updates, the use of social media started out as a chore, but became more rewarding as the band gained fans through not only traditional means, but also through its Internet presence.

"It was the shameless self promotion thing, but it's turned around a little bit which is really cool because instead of us trying to shove ourselves down someone's throat, so to speak, people are actually interested in what we have to say which is really exciting," Bancroft enthuses. "I think it's important to stay as connected to your fans as possible because we're still just getting started and it's exciting for us that people are interested in our music and what we're doing."

Utilizing a blog isn't about some vague notion of "giving back"—this isn't some fan club from the '50s where a member gets a membership card and a hat or anything like that, this is about a conversation between people producing art and those consuming it. Blogs—all social media, in fact—are about creating an intimate space where fans and musicians can interact directly between tour stops, albums or interviews. It's about creating a new kind of relationship between bands and fans, it's about letting people behind the curtain a little bit, but not in some contrived VH1 type of way. If industry big wigs are to be believed, the Internet is killing music, but what it's actually doing is bringing musicians and their audience closer together than ever before.

Two years ago, the members of Edmonton's potty-mouthed Leftnutt were all but amateurs, self-admittedly terrible players, and touted themselves as "the worst shitty-ass fucking band in this history of shitty-ass bands." They would play for free for whoever would allow them on their stage. The following year, after a bit of polish, they upgraded themselves to "Edmonton's Worst Fucking Band" but they were still getting paid in beer, usually Pilsner, and sometimes, if they did really well, they'd split for a bottle of Jack Daniels. Leftnutt was discovered playing for beer at a CD release party for a local band, the Ghetto Blasters, and Dixon Christie's Dead Bunny Records vowed on the spot to sign this unabashed, unashamed and uncompromising group of adolescent potty mouths.

Souljah Fyah, a reggae band with members hailing from all across the globe, has an impressive resume that includes opening slots for reggae giants like Morgan Heritage and Mikey Dread, touring Western Canada and over 100 shows under the band's belt. While the group is fundamentally roots reggae, Souljah Fyah's members have been influenced by everything from classical, calypso, rock, jazz, blues, funk, latin and hip hop. With the use of kalimbas, xylophone, flute, congas, bass and acoustic guitar, the sound pushes the boundaries of contemporary reggae.

slightly baffling to me, given that much of this is breaking news. (I actually heard someone in the theatre tell their friend, "I can't finish this," referring to what, if my nose was correct, must have been nachos and some substance dubiously advertised as cheese.) But Kenner and company do such a sturdy—if too concise—job of laying out and updating the essential arguments, an approach surprisingly low on scare-tactics and big on plain-spoken testimony from those inside the industry and out, that I can only hope the shocked will feel empowered to make needed changes in their diets, votes and consumer habits.

Significant groundwork for Food Inc. was done in recent books like Eric Schlosser's Fast Food Nation and Michael Pollan's The Omnivore's Dilemma. Both authors feature prominently in Food Inc., with Schlosser introduced while ordering a burger and fries—his confessed favourite meal—from a diner. To be sure, the primary concerns of these authors aren't centred on making us feel bad about wanting sugar, fat and salt. In fact, they make it plain that we're hard-wired to crave the stuff. The question is about how those cravings are monitored and fulfilled, and what our most accessible and seemingly affordable options are doing to our bodies, the results running the gamut from obesity to an epidemic of diabetes to sudden death. Such was the fate that befell a two-year-old whose mother is now a tireless food safety activist and who also appears in Food Inc. to outline the infuriating difficulty in getting health standards enforced.

As the opening voice-over informs us, food production has changed more in the past 40 years than in the previous 10 000. Supermarkets no longer have seasons. Chickens are forced to grow so quickly that their bones are too weak for them to walk. There are only 13 abattoirs in all of the US, meaning that an untold number of animals might be contained in a single patty—animals eating corn-based byproducts they'd never eaten until recently, wading in their own shit, which follows them all the way to your plate, inviting an ongoing stream of E. coli outbreaks. Cheapness makes the products alluring, yet a Latino family interviewed explains that they have to spend a huge portion of their income on their father's diabetes medicine rather than on basic vegetables, and indeed, a head of lettuce costs more than a cheeseburger. So yeah, something feels a little wrong here, and you have to give credit to Kenner for not only avoiding hysteria but for closing the film with some digestible advice. He also features interviews with old-school holdout farmers—some real characters begging for a movie of their own—who prove that there is indeed another way to do this, though to (re-) institute it requires massive change. Are we hungry enough? V

Brüno

Directed by Larry Charles
Written by Sacha Baron Cohen, Dan Mazer, Anthony Hines, Jeff Schaffer, Peter Baynham
Starring Cohen

Sacha Baron Cohen's greatest comedic strength is the characters he creates. The attributes he imbues them with—Ali G is completely vacuous, Borat is a wacky foreigner, Brüno is gayer than Christmas—has allowed Cohen's characters to be the most subversive in television and movies today, because the general lack of intelligence that interview subjects attribute to them makes these subjects treat them differently, humour them, often say more than they meant to say.

It's this subversion that's where the best of Cohen's comedy lies. Borat exposed the seemingly alarming level of latent racism in America—such as the group of frat boys who suggested that keeping black people for slaves would be a good idea, and that minorities had more rights in America than white people.

Brüno, on the other hand, works best when showing off the staggering levels of hypocrisy and vacuousness that exist in Hollywood and the fashion industry. A classic Brüno skit from Da Ali G Show, where the character originated, had Brüno interviewing a fashion designer about the themes of his latest show, all of which were contradictions. With the designer in total agreement, Brüno talks about how the show has "no humour," how it's "humorous all the way through," it's "all about the individual," "all about other people," "heavy," and finally "light as a feather."

The same holds true in the movie. The most successful parts occur in the first half, when Brüno is making his way through the Hollywood machine, trying to become famous. His interview with Paula Abdul about her humanitarian causes while she sits on top of a "Mexican chair person" is illuminating, as is his meeting with a pair of charity PR consultants who inform him that Darfur—which they all agree is in Iraq or something—is a really hot cause right now, sure to bring him plenty of attention.

Which isn't to say that all of the humour is so high-minded. Indeed, some of the dick jokes in this movie are sure to become legendary, and the Larry-David-uncomfortable-silence moments are more than squirm-worthy, but it's the high-minded stuff that deconstructs the dual façades of Hollywood and fashion which is so transgressive, so enlightening, questioning the motives behind what the public is constantly reminded is selfless behaviour in a way more effective than an essay or an editorial would be.

It's because the first half plays on the character's strengths and seems so perfectly executed that the second half falls flat. Moving on from his examination of Hollywood to a process of trying to become straight—Brüno noticed that all of the big stars in Hollywood were, ostensibly, heterosexual—the humour becomes a bit forced. Instead of using Brüno's orientation as a tool to get information, the second half of the movie uses it as the punchline for cheap and easy laughs. Interviews with pastors who think they can help Brüno become straight are funny, but they're not as smart. In the movie's penultimate scene, where a crowd of people goes apeshit after being promised a mixed martial arts event that turns into a gay makeout session, the bait and switch is humorous, but not exactly unexpected. The event was, after all, in Arkansas, and fans of mixed martial arts more than likely are not fans of gay porn. There's no subtext or intelligence.

Ultimately, Brüno is certainly a movie worth seeing, if only to hear all its best lines before they become shorthand for humour the next time you find yourself attending the same party as a group of "bros." Unfortunately, it doesn't live up to Cohen's best work, and the shift in focus hampers the second half.

I Love You, Beth Cooper

Directed by Chris Columbus
Written by Larry Doyle
Starring Hayden Panettiere, Paul Rust

Two observations that basically sum up I Love You, Beth Cooper, a movie that apparently was trying to trade off Hayden Panettiere skill (if that's the right word at all) at playing a cheerleader: first, it's the kind of movie that thinks enough of its audience to feel the need to point out that the "Maybe not today, maybe not tomorrow" speech comes from Casablanca (which is, at least according to the AFI, literally the most-influential movie, quote-wise, ever made). Second, it's so riveting I finally figured out exactly what the Under Armour logo is meant to represent (it's a U and A that make an X, I assume for "Xtreme"), for lack of anything else to think about for the last 20 minutes or so (to be fair, the main character, a stereotypically geeky valedictorian, happens to wear one for a while—it wasn't just pure mind-wandering).

A more trenchant observation would be to point out that Beth Cooper completely follows an unfortunate rule that Freaks and Geeks creator Paul Feig once laid out when talking to this magazine about why he writes his teenage characters with an air of bittersweet failure: namely, that most writers tend to have been geeks in high school, so when they write about it they don't want to relive the experience, so they create an idealized, unrealistic world where the geek wins in the end. Thus, nerdy Dennis (Paul Rust) delivers a horrific (and blandly unfunny) valedictory expressing his love for the eponymous cheerleader, and then has a wacky, entirely unbelievable (and blandly unfunny) night hanging out with her where he learns a valuable lesson and kind of gets the girl.

This is made worse by the fact that the film sort of feints at some interesting, heartfelt moments—specifically, that the life of a sought-after cheerleader kind of peaks at high school—that fall more or less completely flat, due to the aforementioned unbelievability/wackiness. The end result is a teen comedy that is neither touching nor funny, and lends itself to ruminations on sportswear logo design.

On DVD

Tokyo!

Written & directed by Michel Gondry, Leos Caraz, Bong Joon-ho

This triptych sets each of its tales within the titular Japanese capital, but unlike similarly conceived recent tributes to Paris, New York and Toronto, the filmmakers arrive on the scene to reveal far more perverse invention than touristy affection toward their host city. Here, here! Tokyo!, now available on DVD from Liberation Entertainment, is no more a cohesive masterpiece than your average omnibus feature, but, helmed by two mischievous Frenchmen and a Korean—talk about courting contentious international relations—it is bold, strange, fun and occasionally thought provoking.

Transplanting Gabrielle Bell's graphic novel Cecil and Jordan in New York to the other side of the planet, Michel Gondry's "Interior Design" finds a typical Gondry self-appointed creative genius hoping against the odds to make it big in the big, crowded city with his ramshackle, no-budget apocalypse disaster flicks—screened with smoke machines for that twee theatrical edge. The real protagonist here, however, is the fledging auteur's girlfriend, played by Steven Segal's daughter Ayako Fugitani, who by contrast is a sort of non-being, a person with no significant ambitions of her own. She eventually seems to vanish altogether in a surreal twist that's best discovered in the moment. I enjoyed the film, but I couldn't help but question Gondry's subconscious motives and the ostensible inventiveness of creating this character of a Japanese woman who only finds herself by being transformed into the perfect object of servility.

Most memorable by far is Leos Carax's "Merde," the director's first film in a decade and a wildly caustic bit of politically hostile monster movie chaos. Everyone's favourite nutcase Denis Lavant crawls out of the Tokyo sewers like some demented offspring of a violent, racist French leprechaun and Harpo Marx driven insane by painful cataracts and years of living underground. In an opening sequence of inspired anarchy, he terrorizes the local citizenry by gobbling cash and flowers, stealing smoking cigarettes and then tossing the burning butts into baby carriages. He's finally captured and put on trial, defended by one of the only people on Earth to speak his language—though once everyone knows what he's saying this only serves to make the creature even more unsympathetic. He's condemned to death, but monsters never die easily in the Japanese cinema, nor do martyrs of its bureaucratic processes (see Oshima's Death by Hanging for the climactic sequence's basis). Sequels are promised. Shit!

"Shaking Tokyo," directed by The Host's Bong Joon-ho and starring Tokyo Sonata's wonderful Teruyuki Kagawa, is as obsessed with apocalypse as its predecessors, but is as sweet and sensitive as "Merde" is grotesque and outrageous. Taking the national xenophobia under fire by Carax into a much quieter place, the film concerns a hikikomori—Japanese for shut-in—who's solitary life of reading, shitting, sleeping and building orderly walls of pizza boxes and toilet paper rolls is interrupted by the possibility of love with a pizza delivery girl in danger of becoming just as reclusive as he is. The narrative naturally lends itself to a predictable climax of classical emotional liberation, but Bong, with great help from the tightly wound but finely expressive Kagawa, does a lovely job of making the journey distinctive and compelling.

Social Distortion rolls on

SOEN MUNRO

Punk and country are a couple of things that just seem to go together. There's a famous photograph of Johnny Cash flipping the bird at the camera, and that's the sort of image that grabs the boundary between the two genres, kicks it in the gut and tears it to shreds, leaving only the strongest standing in the aftermath.

And, surely, one of those left standing has to be California's Social Distortion. Led by frontman and main songwriter Mike Ness, the band has weathered many storms over the years—among them addictions, lineup changes and the death of longtime guitarist Dennis Danell from a brain aneurysm in 2000—yet there are no signs that the band is stopping its run of punk- and country-tinted rock 'n' roll anytime soon as it wraps up a tour on European soil and prepares for a charge across Canada and then back down into its home country.

Over the course of six albums, beginning with 1983's Mommy's Little Monster, Ness has brewed his songs with a mix of punk and country, fusing the two into a sound that suits the singer's raspy voice and steady guitar attack just right. But if there seems to be a little less country and a bit more straight ahead rock 'n' roll on the band's 2004 effort, Sex, Love and Rock 'n' Roll, that may be because in recent years Ness has also been carrying on a solo career that sees him carousing along the dirt roads of the country, sticking close to his acoustic guitar on a couple of solo albums and a few tours.

But the solo career is by no means a threat to the existence of Ness's band; in fact, Jonny Wickersham, Social Distortion's guitarist since a benefit concert for Danell's family that took place in 2000, was on the road last year for a series of solo dates alongside Ness, and he says that it was no stretch for him to pick a little country guitar.

"I grew up with it being played around the house and I was always very partial to it. Then later on in life I kind of had a rediscovery of it," Wickersham says over the phone from London, England. "By the time I was in my early 20s, even my late teens, really, I was already really starting to check out early blues and country and stuff like that and just really digging into the roots, and then progressively over the years more and more."

A background and appreciation for country also serves Wickersham well in Social Distortion. Even when the volume's turned up, Ness's style of songwriting within the band harkens back to Cash's: there's more confession than politics in Social Distortion's songs. Given the personal nature of the words that Ness brings to the table, it's easy to wonder how Wickersham approaches his guitar parts for the songs—does he find it necessary to understand exactly what Ness is singing about, grilling the singer on the meanings behind the words?

IN THE LIGHT >> Social Distortion's leader Mike Ness, thrashing his guitar on stage

"That's a good question," Wickersham laughs. "I approach it the way somebody that's listening to the song that's really affected by the lyrics would. So it's almost as if I'm like listening to it from the same point of view as a fan or something, but the difference being that I can put my own personal feel into it as well.

"It's kind of just a general feeling that would involve both the lyrics and the music and what it lends itself to melodically," he continues. "But that's the cool thing about the development of a song, is that as you kind of get into it and you're working on it and you go through the different stages of development from just like an acoustic guitar to practising out with a band to maybe doing a demo version and then actually going into the studio, then the lyrics are coming together—that's when you get inspired to throw things in that might be definitely playing off of what's being said with the lyrics as opposed to what you're hearing just within the context of the music side of the song, the music and the melody.

As he speaks, Wickersham comes across as a guy who is very much in tune with his bandmates, his approach to the guitar influenced by those standing next to him on the stage—or those sitting behind him as it may be.

"There's an old saying: 'You're only as good as your drummer,'" he says. "That's definitely, in my experience, extremely true, and I've been fortunate enough to play with some fantastic drummers over the years."

One of those drummers was Charlie Quintana, who played with a range of bandleaders from Bob Dylan to Izzy Stradlin before he took up the sticks in Social Distortion, joining the band in 2000 and leaving in April 2009. Wickersham speaks fondly of Quintana, acknowledging that it can sometimes be difficult to make the shift to playing with a new musician.

"It does come down to a real subtle thing and it is very difficult to articulate at times," he explains. "It's definitely a chemistry. I believe very much in a chemistry thing, and it doesn't always involve the musicianship of a person. A lot of times it can involve a whole lot more personality—how do you get along with that person and how do you relate in terms of life and not just music?"

Fortunately, Wickersham says that Quintana's replacement, Adam Willard, has fallen right in step with the band as Social Distortion looks ahead to a new studio album at the end of the coming tour schedule.

"We're not actually in the studio right now cranking it out, but we plan on getting in there—we've got a bunch of songs and plan on getting in there and finishing stuff that's incomplete and getting something done by the end of the year," Wickersham says. "I don't know what the release on that would be, but we're doing the Canadian run coming up and then a US run following that and then we're going to get into the studio. V

Outbreak

Sandor's music career continues to infect

Over the last several weeks, I have been relaying my misadventures as I attempt to promote my first album, which I released on TuneCore this past June. I recorded it in my living room and, as an experiment in viral marketing, I put it up on iTunes, Amazon and other e-tailers around the world through TuneCore—all for $52.42. I am on a quest to make my money back.

This past week, I sent off a bunch of copies of my album to college radio stations across Canada—and CBC Radio 3, too—along with a few smaller publications. I also sent one off to PROUD FM, Toronto's gay and lesbian station. (Not to sound too much like the schlocky Samantha character from Sex and the City, but a key part of a viral campaign is to engage the gay community. There is no denying its role as a tastemaker and trendsetter.)

Still, sending out CDs and putting up posters on lampposts around Toronto—which I did while taking my son out for our regular morning walks—won't guarantee anyone will actually take notice of my work. More had to be done. Online.

So, with no radio airplay or tour dates to support the new album, how could I get people to listen to the music? How could I direct people to go to iTunes or my MySpace site to give the songs some listens?

Well, I did take some footage my wife and I had shot from trips to the Ontario Science Centre, Montréal's totally psychedelic Palais de Congrès and Havana. I processed them all in iMovie, added some effects, and, voila! A cheap and easy music video. I posted that to YouTube.

Still, though, chances of someone stumbling across it in the YouTube multiverse are slim. So, I had to work harder—and smarter.

One of the key selling tips TuneCore provides to its clients is to ensure your music gets referred when people are searching similar artists. Basically, when someone is checking up on some electronic/experimental acts on Amazon or iTunes, I want my album to pop up as recommendations from the sites.

How does one do that? Create lists. On Amazon, I made a series of "Listmania" lists, putting my songs onto mixes with the likes of Daft Punk and the Juan Maclean. I then went to iTunes and created iMixes, mixing some of my more dancefloor-friendly songs with the likes of the aforementioned bands, and my noisier tracks were placed on lists with experimental artists like Wolf Eyes and Add (N) to X. The more referrals I create the better the chance my album will pop up as a recommendation to fans of the other bands I mentioned above.

As well, on MySpace, I contacted a bunch of bands who I think may have fans who might be interested in hearing what I have to offer, and became their online friend. If my name pops up at the bottom of their MySpace pages, there's a chance someone might check it out.

Is it dishonest for me to recommend my own music? To me, it's the modern equivalent of a band getting all of its friends to phone a radio station or email MuchMusic to request one of its songs. And, it's less invasive. Just because a link to my music might appear when customers browse Daft Punk on Amazon or iTunes, they don't have to click it. And, it also means that people into over-the-top pop like Britney won't be bothered by me. Hey, chances are they aren't going to appreciate my vocals distorted into a buzz by a microphone that came with my wife's copy of the Karaoke Revolution video game, or my attempts to create the H chord in GarageBand.

Basically, it's a case of me trying to create some kind of viral marketing plan, while remaining within my budget. Which is, really, no budget at all. V

Montréal band journeys in song

WINDY DAY >> Bell Orchestre braves the elements—or one of them, anyway // Delphine Bally

CAROLYN NIKODYM
// CAROLYN@VUEWEEKLY.COM

If you see the album as a snapshot in time of band, then Bell Orchestre's As Seen Through Windows holds an image of musicians a little more striking.

While that might be the hope for a sophomore album, it is, nonetheless, no mean feat. With 2005's minimal Recording a Tape the Colour of Light, Bell Orchestre tapped into something much more internalized and introspective than expected, given the band's ties to Arcade Fire and Montréal's indie-rock scene. The band continues down that path with confidence—a definite advantage when delving into a genre as vague as post-rock, because there's always a chance that listeners might not get it.

> We come at it first with just improvising together, and then we usually just record improvisations, we listen back and kind of slowly craft something.

"Definitely, I think about that sometimes. We are making exactly whatever music comes out of our heads at the time. At the same time, because we bridge with so many influences, I feel like it becomes more accessible, maybe, than if we were genre specific," violinist Sarah Neufeld says. "People like my parents can get into it, because there is some reference to jazz and classical, so more avant garde stuff can get into it, because it's sort of leaning towards that, but yeah, sometimes it feels like we are really indulging in our own fantasies.

"But at the same time, that's just one side of it, because it's so fun," she adds. "It's such a joy to play for an older and a younger crowd that are just coming from such diverse backgrounds. We don't have a scene. And that just feels like you're really getting into life and getting outside of pop culture."

It's a sentiment that comes across in how you can visualize the music the Bell Orchestre creates. Joyful moments bounce and uneasy ones seethe. These are effects that the six-piece—rounded out by Richard Parry, Pietro Amato, Kaveh Nabatian, Stefan Schneider and Mike Feuerstack—works hard to create.

"Usually, it doesn't come from one specific idea, where we go, 'We're going to make something like this.' We go on a journey, like, a really long journey," Neufeld laughs, "with every piece, because we really come at it from all angles. We come at it first with just improvising together, and then we usually just record improvisations, we listen back and kind of slowly craft something. It's very one foot in front of the other."

As much as Bell Orchestre strives to push the sonic envelope, there is simplicity and maturity in this approach, and the figure it casts is of a band growing more dynamic. V

The Lovely Feathers takes aim at society on new album

AREN'T THEY LOVELY? >> The Lovely Feathers return with the followup to 2006's Hind Hind Legs // Shannon Hansen

FRANCIS MITHRUSH
FRANCIS@VUEWEEKLY.COM

With the smashing success of Hind Hind Legs back in 2006, Mark Kupfert and the Lovely Feathers seemed on top of the pop world. Surely, as many rising Montréal indie bands as there were at the time, they didn't think that all the critical praise would be so fleeting.

"We were just playing Montréal shows and then all of a sudden some dude saw us and we were on tour with Metric," Kupfert explains. "We had this fast rise. It was trippy, we got so lucky so many times. We were riding this wave and then all of a sudden it just topples over us. We got home from our last tour and our label didn't need us anymore."

As the Feathers stood on the precipice of being tossed in the one-album-wonder bin, Kupfert et al. wondered what to do next. Having met years before at McGill University, the cohort decided it was best to take some time off—indefinitely. A couple years later, when their long hiatus was starting to look like a permanent break, the guys returned to Montréal from the corners of the world they had escaped to and decided to give it another go.

"I think over that year we just got sick of the songs, sick of each other," Kupfert explains about their initial success storm. "We knew we had to pay our dues, but it was more about being a great experience. In the second act when the veneer faded, all the trippiness became more of a routine, and I think we weren't prepared for that. This time we are."

Now with a new label and a new release, Kupfert says the time off was a much needed period for reflection. The band's latest album, Fantasy of the Lot, is a fun but scathing review of archived societal values—things that seemed like a good idea at the time that are now acknowledged to be unnecessary, even damaging. One page of the liner notes blares "ARE YOU CERTAIN" between images of 1950s vehicles and old motel pools.

"The thing about motels, cars, suburbs—that's a very powerful trio—it's all about this conception back in the '40s and '50s where cars were the future and it was exciting," Kupfert says. "Suburbs were where you had your grass, and you'd drive to your motel to swim in the pool. That was the fantasy, that's what the fantasy lot was. As humans we have to keep moving, trying exciting things, not realizing the implications. Now we look back at all that and we're like, 'What were we thinking?' You realize how completely messed up it was, besides the environment. I look back and think how weird and alien it was to feel like you weren't supposed to be walking around ever, you know? I grew up in a suburb where there were no sidewalks.

"What we're interested in is the idea that we get so wrapped up in the present regarding exciting things that are 'the future' that we forget that there are consequences eventually," he continues, comparing the current explosion of cell phone use to the eventual realization that cigarettes were a health hazard. "We've become a cell-phone-dependent culture in 15 years. Now you're getting these studies coming out where kids under the age of 20 using a cell phone a lot have an increased chance of developing tumours. Obviously it's still in the speculation stage because there are no long-term studies, but it's only been 15 years."

Considering the Feathers' fast rise and subsequent stumble, Kupfert explains that the new album's theme sprung from the realization that things aren't always as grand as they seem at first. "In terms of it being a concept album, in the end it's more of a personal observation of the last three years, of how polarized it's been with the ups and downs and all that," he says. "We had some bad relationships, we had some crappy jobs, and underneath was the umbrella of society. It all kind of tied in." V

Flash Lightnin' strikes again

ON THE TABLE >> Toronto's Flash Lightnin' hits the road with the Eagles of Death Metal // Supplied

MIKE ARGUS

Halfway through my interview with Flash Lightnin' guitarist/singer Darren Glover, there's an awkward pause.

"Wait, did you say you're from Vue? Last time I did an interview with you guys, you said I sounded like a mix between Colin James and Axl Rose."

For journalists and artists alike, this game can be dangerous territory. Not only is it often a result of lazy journalism, it can also be an artist's incredulity at being "misunderstood." Thankfully, it turns out it wasn't Vue after all, and even more impressively, it's a fragile battle of egos that Glover is disinterested in pursuing.

"I have a lot more respect for the more popular Canadian acts that I once dismissed," he offers diplomatically, "[because] once you get out there, you realize these bands work hard, and they earn the rights to these fans, and you gotta do the same. They totally deserve it. Say what you want about some artists, but the reality is they've put in the hard work, and it's not an easy game."

After two years of paying its own dues, the Toronto power-trio's tasty approach to blues-fuelled hard rock has earned it both street cred and continued successes, from a weekly residency at Toronto's painfully-hip Dakota Tavern to an upcoming tour opening for LA's kings of throwback, tongue-in-mustachio'd-cheek riff-rockers the Eagles of Death Metal.

"[The 18-month Dakota gig, now since over,] was amazing, it was such an experience. We obviously miss it—it was fun and that's how we met everyone we're working with," Glover enthuses, referring to the many relaionships the band's developing as a result. "We were lucky; we know how to play, and when the Dakota opened up, some rock stars started showing up just by fluke, and we became friends and they started spreading the word. We kept on working hard to deliver, and it snowballed from there."

Of these friendships came unlikely collaborations for the writing and recording of the band's upcoming full-length album—writing partners who just happen to be some of Canada's best known songwriters. "There's a reason we're working with Jimmy Shaw of Metric, and songwriting with Ron Sexsmith—because it's better with some kind of twist and diversity, instead of what would be considered the norm. That's the important part, that's what makes music hopefully different, and helps us get out of 'crotch rock' and more into something really cool. Ron Sexsmith is coming up with amazing ideas for a rock band. And I think that's exciting."

Outside of the studio, playing live and expanding its audience is still what fuels the band.

"Playing [Toronto] every week, you realize ... there are people that genuinely care about music and are really supportive. They're not looking for a trend; they're just looking for good music. Some people are just looking for a trend, and the music doesn't need to be as good as the trend.

"Once we got signed [to Pheromone Recordings], we did some great tours," he continues. "That's what brought us out to Edmonton the first time, which is awesome. Pretty much the best audiences for us are Edmonton, Calgary and Toronto. People get it. They're into it. We look forward to those shows the most.

"It's a lot of hard work—the hardest thing is driving across this country. You find out who the real Canadian people are, and it's fun to learn how to play to them. Canada's a big country. Edmonton's a long way from Toronto." V

The Tom Fun Orchestra is comfortable in close quarters

ORCHESTRATED FUN >> Energetic live shows are the Tom Fun Orchestra's stock-in-trade // Supplied

PAUL BUNOV
// BUNOV@VUEWEEKLY.COM

Night after night, the Tom Fun Orchestra has been building its reputation around an innate ability to perform a killer live show. The Cape Breton-based eight-piece is gaining renown for its performances and, as if in response, keeps adding tour dates to its agenda: the upcoming trek across the country follows a highly-praised winter tour, both ventures in promotion of the group's bombastic debut album You Will Land With a Thud. And between those tours, the band filled the time by playing even more shows around the coast.

"We haven't really stopped," vocalist/ringleader Ian MacDougall laughs. "We just did a trip to Newfoundland ... I'm just kind of recovering, and waiting to get back in the van again on Saturday."

It's a demanding schedule to maintain, but that road time has paid off in both critical and audience acclaim: the band recently netted awards for new artist of the year and entertainers of the year—the second one voted on by fans—at the Music Nova Scotia awards.

Of course, the Tom Fun Orchestra isn't the only maritime band known for its party-on disposition, something that doesn't escape MacDougall's attention.

"I think it's just something in the water," he laughs, and maybe he's right. But the Tom Fun Orchestra approaches its east coast influence from a different angle: where those Great Big maritime bands find energy in beefing up a more traditional sound—shanty-ish ballads channeled through (mostly) modern rock set ups—the Tom Fun Orchestra mixes fiddle, electric guitar, banjo and violin into a modern pastiche of foot stompers and uplifting coastal rockers. If traditional influences come through, it's in no greater degree than any other influence on the group's sound.

According to MacDougall, working up the energy to do the band's songs justice every night takes a special breed of musician, and he's fortunate to have assembled the right—and rightly scented—crowd.

"It takes a special combination of weirdos," he jokes. "It just kind of happens. We all get along somehow. We're very comfortable with each other and our various smells. I think you subconsciously brace yourself for spending that much time with so many different people, because you know, thinking of it when I'm just in the comfort of home it doesn't really seem so appealing, but once we're on the road it's actually a really good time. We tend to enjoy ourselves."

He also points out that, despite all the acclaim, a big, energetic live show wasn't the goal when the Tom Fun Orchestra first formed. That, like the musical crew he's assembled, just felt right when the band took to the stage. At least, for now it does.

"There was no real direction when the band first started, and I think, the more energetic songs got a better reaction live, and it just became more enjoyable for us to play music that really got people moving," he explains. "But it wasn't really something we set out to do. I think that'll take twists and turns with the progression of the band. We have quite a few more mellow tunes that are coming out, and that's not really a conscious decision either. It just seems to be what happens." V

The Dead Weather
Horehound
(Third Man)

EDER MUNRO
// EDER@VUEWEEKLY.COM

Jack White strikes again with yet another band. Granted, White's not really in all that many groups, but with his main gig in the White Stripes being flanked by roles in the likes of the Raconteurs and the Dead Weather, not to mention one-off gigs like his work on Loretta Lynn's Van Lear Rose and a number of other production gigs, it sometimes seems like he's all over the map as far as his commitments go.

But White also demonstrates an impressive dedication to whatever it is that he's doing at the moment, and with the Dead Weather, like the Raconteurs before it, the group is really a band and not just some side project for White. In fact, to White's credit, he actually sits pretty comfortably in the background—literally, as he takes over the drum stool in the band—letting the Kills vocalist Alison Mosshart take the lead, and, save for an acoustic guitar on a single song, leaving the guitar firmly in the hands of Queens of the Stone Age's Dean Fertita. (Mosshart and bassist Jack Lawrence also take a turn or two at adding their own six-string sounds.)

None of that means that White's presence doesn't loom large over the Dead Weather's debut, though: in his role as producer, White sticks to the rawness that has been a hallmark of the White Stripes' albums, shouted vocals emerging from the distance behind overdriven guitars and heavy grooves with '70s, Led Zeppelin-esque riffing all over the place. And when he contributes to the songwriting, it's relatively easy to imagine a song like "I Cut Like a Buffalo," with it's trippy reggae/rock mix, appearing in the context of one of his other bands.

But the Dead Weather still sets itself apart from those other groups, its membership laying claim to the songs with a vengeance. Mosshart in particular impresses, coming on like a supernatural force that rises up from the circular, trance-like rhythms that the quartet favours throughout Horehound.

And there's no denying the chemistry between Fertita and Lawrence, as guitar and bass work together to create a swirling chorus of distortion—that's the case on the slow-burning ebb and flow of "So Far From Your Weapon" and the fuzzed-out crunch of the band's take on Bob Dylan's "New Pony"—that seems as likely to degenerate into a cacophony as it does to make it through to the end of the song. (Fertita also lays down an assortment of wild keyboard sounds throughout, fleshing out the sound nicely.)

Of course, White's role on drums cannot be forgotten here. If ever there was a case to be made that the beat is the backbone of a band, this is it. White thunders like a caveman, whether he's laying back, as he does halfway through the lumbering "Hang You from the Heavens," stopping the tune and then generating a roll of thunder as he brings the song back together, or just powering straight on through to the close, as on the thumping "Treat Me Like Your Mother."

The Dead Weather may get some mileage out of White's presence, but Horehound is no solo work; the album is organic-sounding, the quartet's instruments melding into a single, monstrous sound. V

Extra Happy Ghosts!!! How The Beach Boys Sound To Those With No Feelings
(Saved By Radio)

To classify Calgary's Matthew Swann (you might remember him from Hot Little Rocket) as "quick witted" may be a bit of an understatement. I'd challenge you to find another bassist that can cover ideas from existentialism to Buddhism and philosophers from Sartre to Dostoyevsky over the course of 20 minutes. In these six short tracks, Swann does exactly that. One drink with this guy and you'll probably find yourself reconsidering the meaning of life and whether or not you even care about it anymore. His songs are all distorted and lo-fi and moody enough to satisfy self-denying hipsters, but still catchy and sarcastic to appeal to those admitted suckers for over-intellectual poetics. There's straight-faced Joy Division-y blurts met with random psychedelic drones, all held together by simple, watery drum beats. Maybe a tad pretentious, but I'd still take Swann plunking away in his kitchen over that guy on his soapbox any day.

The James Murdoch Band
Wondering Where The Rush Has Gone
(Shameless)

Heartfelt is more than enough to describe the James Murdoch Band's latest release; anything from a Toronto flight layover to meeting a drunken widower in a liquor store turns up as a tragicomic source of inspiration for Murdoch, who draws from a modest list of travels across North America for what epitomizes contemporary musical storytelling. It helps that Murdoch includes in the liner notes a few words about the driving force behind every track, which in many cases might prove excessive. Instead, Murdoch's willingness to share the lone experience of the singer-songwriter fleshes out the appeal of what may otherwise sound traditional and easy to overlook in an industry where experimentation rules

T. Nile
The Cabin Song EP
(T. Nile Music)

It's patently unfair that an artist as young as Vancouver-based banjo belle Tamara Nile not only has a great deal of talent and ability, but has already honed a distinctive and ambitiously developing creative voice. The Cabin Song EP is more than just a placeholder between her debut album and next full-length—it's a coherent set of seven songs that give way to one another with the easy fluidity of a richly episodic summer getaway novel, nestled in an aural landscape of bluesy backcountry rock. Our heroine is introduced with a twangy, driving chapter of formative childhood recollections, following which we take a turn into earthy yearning lustiness. A pair of reflective, poetic instrumentals then bracket an anthemic, grittily self-affirming ditty that manages to stay pleasingly ahead of hopelessly folksy, before the final two tracks drift into the kind of slightly cosmic happy ending that would beguile Daniel Lanois. It may be a touch middlebrow, but it's well done and it's summer, and we could all use a retreat to a charmed creaky lakeside cabin suffused with the healing heat of new love.
MARY CHRISTA O'KEEFE

Spookey Ruben
Mechanical Royalty
(Sonic Unyon)

Mechanical Royalty spends its time trying to find the sweet spot between being too weird and being way, way too weird. It's difficult to tell if it succeeds. The musicianship on display is undeniably impressive, particularly on the 15-minute rock-opera epic track from which the record draws its name. The production is also A-plus: countless guitars, pianos and vocal tracks all blend together perfectly. But for all his technical excellence, Spookey Ruben remains a little too eccentric for his own good, singing songs about processed cheese and peppering his music with strange, atonal intervals. The album probably won't change your life, it isn't likely to bore you either. It might be just the thing for the musically adventurous.

Still heavy and still overblown, but kind of fun. That's the new Priest album for you. It's good—not great—with some deep album cuts instead of the greatest hits. But no "Loch Ness"? That's criminal.

The Young Canadians
Hawaii EP
(Quintessence)
Originally released: 1980

OLD SOUNDS
Eden Munro

"Let's go to fucking Hawaii / Get drunk in the sun / I want to lay on Waikiki / Get a tan on my buns / Running from the rain / Thousands on the run / Making like they're rich / Heading for the fun."

So shouts the Young Canadians' singer/guitarist Art Bergmann on the band's debut EP, 1980's Hawaii. It wasn't the first appearance on vinyl for the trio—rounded out by bassist Jim Bescott and drummer Barry Taylor, the band first recorded as the K-Tels, contributing "I Hate Music" to the 1979 compilation Vancouver Complication—but it was the debut as the Young Canadians, and it found the three punks dropping the gloves right from the opening notes.

NO ESCAPE >> But the Canuck beach punks try

It's the initial surf-guitar riff of the title track that sets the tone for the EP; "Hawaii" is far removed from the California beach culture that so many groups sprung from. Initially one might be forgiven for thinking that the Young Canadians mean well, but can't quite hit those clean and happy notes that the band's southern cousins had a decade and a half earlier. But the truth is that, springing forth from the cold and wet world of Vancouver, this band wasn't looking to escape into some dream world of beach parties and good times.

As soon as Bergmann lets loose with that initial "Let's go to fucking Hawaii," the record spins into an entirely new direction. No longer does it seem like it might be an innocent, well-meaning throwback as it assumes the opposite approach, quickly snowballing into a scathing assessment of a culture's focus on getting away, tossing away cash that might be better spent in places closer to home.

Next up, "Well, Well, Well" continues the band's scathing assault on society: "I don't care / I'm just in training for a manager's shift / in the central interior." There's a grind to daily life and the Young Canadians swing at it, juxtaposing the banalities of life with the cuts of punk-rock guitar, bass and drums. It's an effective illustration of just what the young punks of 1980 were up against.

Where the lyrics are perfectly balanced against the music in the first two tracks, on "Hullabaloo Girls" the music takes the lead, the Young Canadians getting into a rock-solid groove, with the vocals matching it step for step as the energy builds. It's not that the lyrics are a disappointment so much as that they simply can't compete with the instruments here.

The EP wraps up with "No Escape," the lyrics once again coming to the fore as the band lays down a tale riddled with oppresiveness—"They've got the guns and the numbers," Bergmann sings of the police, setting up the eternal battle of the system versus the youth, while the trio shifts between the moody guitar on the intro and the pounding, bass-driven verses.

Initial pressings of Hawaii came with an additional EP, the Young Canadian's first, entitled Automan and recorded in 1979 as the K-Tels but not released until '80. The band would last for one more EP, This Is Your Life, which found the group's style shifting towards new wave and the playing getting tighter and more refined than the crash-and-burn string-slashing the trio blasted through Hawaii's four tracks with. The band's entire catalogue can now be found on the compilation No Escape, available from Sudden Death Records.

PREVUE // 100 MILE HOUSE

The long cold winter

Duo trades in a high cost of living for chills

SETTLING DOWN >> 100 Mile House's core duo left London, England to plant roots in Edmonton // Supplied

JAMES STEWART

After first meeting at an admittedly awkward open-mic show in Toronto, Peter Stone and Denise MacKay quickly struck up a musical partnership that has spanned six years and several continents. Most recently, the two found themselves fleeing the bustle of London's music scene for the more down-home comforts of our fair city.

"We came over in early December last year—just in time for a month of -30 weather," laughs Stone, a native of the UK. "We used to live in Edmonton about five or six years ago, before we moved out to London. But, it's not like I was dreading coming back here—we don't really get any snow in the UK, so it's still kind of a novelty for me. But, you know, we'll see how I feel in a few years."

After stripping their six-piece band down to just a guitar and their two voices, Stone and MacKay started 100 Mile House by hiding out in a converted warehouse space in South London and writing their debut EP On That Organ In the House By the Field in summer of 2008.

"Living in London was just such hard work—it's a really expensive city," explains Stone. "It has a reputation as a real music centre, and there's a lot of different music there and a ton of different venues. But it's almost like the city is just too saturated with music. There really is much more of a community spirit here in Edmonton, in part because it is so much smaller. But there's an open-mindedness and kind of kinship among the musical community here."

The pair not only found a sense of camaraderie among its newfound peers, but was also able to reconnect with old friend and collaborator Scott Zubot, an ex-pat who had also once again found himself back in Edmonton. He quickly found a place in 100 Mile House for his talents with both the mandolin and violin.

"We were so lucky to cross paths with Scott again. He recorded an album that Denise made about five years ago. He had left the city too, and happened to move back around the same time we did last year. He brings an added dimension to the band, a real creative energy and enthusiasm."

With plans to record with the new line-up in the fall of this year, Stone is optimistic that the band has found a stable homebase, and a roster and sound it can call its own.

"We really have found a lot of support here—it's been a really great musical atmosphere for us to be in." V

HOROSCOPE

ARIES (Mar 21 – Apr 19)
I fear you're on the verge of slipping into a state of mind that wants everything and is therefore in danger of getting nothing. I worry that you'll be lusting for such total control over so much wild sweetness that you won't actually formulate a foolproof plan to commune with even a pinch of that sweetness. Let's see if we can motivate you to overthrow this state of mind. Let's try to coax you into devising a precise strategy to assemble paradise piece by piece.

TAURUS (Apr 20 – May 20)
Cuckoo birds build no nests of their own. Instead, they rely on trickery to raise their young. The female cuckoo lays her eggs in the nest of a host whose eggs are similar in size and color. The host, often a sparrow, cares for the cuckoo's eggs as her own, and usually rears the hatchlings until they reach maturity. Does this behaviour ring a bell? I suspect that something analogous is unfolding in your world. I'm alerting you to the situation so that you will be fully informed as you decide how to proceed. (P.S. I'm not saying this is a bad thing; just want you to acknowledge the truth.)

GEMINI (May 21 – Jun 20)
I hate to admit it, but love is not always enough to solve every problem. On some occasions you need love, clever insights, strategic maneuvers and fierce determination. In my astrological opinion, this is one of those times. Take a moment right now to shush the grumbling dialogue you keep having with yourself about what's fair and what you deserve. Save all that mental energy for the work of fighting like hell for the fair share you deserve. Oh, and while you're fighting like hell, don't forget to be as strategic as Gandhi, as loving as Einstein and as fiercely determined as Jack Black, Ben Stiller and Sarah Silverman combined.

CANCER (Jun 21 – Jul 22)
I invite you to write down brief descriptions of the five most pleasurable moments you've ever experienced in your life. Let your imagination dwell lovingly on these memories for, say, 20 minutes. And keep them close to the surface of your awareness in the week ahead. If you ever catch yourself slipping into a negative train of thought, interrupt it immediately and compel yourself to fantasize about those Big Five Ecstatic Moments. This exercise will be an excellent way to prime yourself for a New Age of Unhurried Bliss and Gentle Beauty, which I predict is just ahead for you. If you can keep the morose part of your mind quiet, there's a good chance you will stir up a new ecstatic experience that will belong near the top of your all-time list.

LEO (Jul 23 – Aug 22)
Welcome to your aromatherapy workshop, Leo. We'll be using imaginary scents because, frankly, sometimes fantasy yields better results than the real thing. (Especially for you right now; keep that in mind as you deal with other situations in your life.) For your first exercise, imagine the aromas of eucalyptus and vinegar. That'll clear your head of static, creating a nice big empty space for your fresh assignment to come pouring in from the future. Next, imagine the fragrance of hot buttered popcorn. It will make you more receptive to the outside help that has been trying and trying and trying to attract your attention. Have you ever taken a new computer out of the box? Remember that smell? Simulate it now. In your subconscious mind, it will awaken the expectation that the next chapter of your life story is about to begin.

VIRGO (Aug 23 – Sep 22)
O ye of little faith: do ye not understand that the events of mid-July through mid-August of 2009 are but the fruition of seeds ye planted in September, October and November of last year? Do not thank or blame the gods, but only thyself, for the destiny that is upon ye. Now please prepare to assume thy new goodies and perks, O favoured one, as well as thy new temptations and headaches, with full knowledge that ye are receiving the exact rewards and responsibilities ye earned many months ago.

LIBRA (Sep 23 – Oct 22)
Sometimes this job of mine grinds me down with a heavy sense of responsibility. Am I doing the right thing by divulging so many cosmic secrets? Do people use my advice in good ways? This week I'm especially tormented. Would it be ethical of me to reveal that you could dig a hot tip out of a wastebasket, or that you could prosper because of someone else's foolishness? Or how about if I disclosed that you've temporarily acquired a dicey edge over a competitor who's previously kicked your butt? And would it be mean of me to suggest that you shouldn't share a vast idea with a half-vast person? I guess I'll just have to trust that you'll show maximum integrity in using all of this inside dope.

SCORPIO (Oct 23 – Nov 21)
There goes your exaggerated respect for warped chunks of complications. Here comes an opportunity to make a break for bubbly freedom. To take advantage, Scorpio, you'll need to travel much lighter. So please peel off your armour. Wipe that 40-pound sneer of doubt off your face. Bury your broken-down theories by the side of the path, and donate all your unnecessary props to the birds and the bees. Strip down, in other words, to the bare minimum. Where you're going all you'll need are your good looks and a big fresh attitude.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov 22 – Dec 21)
Don't leave me hanging, Sagittarius. What happens next? How could you even imagine you've wrapped the whole thing up? According to my analysis, you've got at least one more riddle to solve, one more gift to negotiate, one more scar to wish upon. (Yes, that says "scar," not "star.") To stop pushing for more adventure at this pregnant moment would be a crime against nature and a whole chapter short of a bestseller. Get out there and bring this story home.

CAPRICORN (Dec 22 – Jan 19)
It makes me famished just to think of you there stewing in your hunger. You almost remind me of a bear that's just awoken from hibernation or a political prisoner who's been on a hunger strike. And yet I know it's not a craving for food that you're suffering from. It's not even an impossible yearning for sex or fame or power or money, either. You're starving, you're ravenous, you're mad for something you don't have a name for—something whose existence you don't fully understand and can't quite imagine. But I predict you'll uncover a fuller truth about this thing very soon, and then you'll be more than halfway toward gratifying your hunger.

AQUARIUS (Jan 20 – Feb 18)
If I were your daddy, I'd take you mountain-climbing or buy you a three-week intensive class in the foreign tongue of your choice. If I were your president, I'd give you a Purple Heart for your undercover heroism and make you ambassador to Italy. If I were your therapist, I'd send you on a pilgrimage to a sanctuary where everyone means exactly what they say. But I'm merely your five-minutes-a-week consultant, so all I can really do is say, "Escape the cramped quarters of your own mind. Slip away from the corners you've been backed into. Stop telling the convoluted stories you've concocted to rationalize why you should be afraid. Get out of the loop and escape into the big, fresh places that will rejuvenate your eyes and heart."

PISCES (Feb 19 – Mar 20)
Long-standing myths are on the verge of mutating. Stories that have remained fixed for years are about to acquire unexpected wrinkles. The effects may be pretty spectacular. I suspect it'll be the equivalent of Sleeping Beauty waking up from her long sleep without the help of the prince's kiss, or like Little Red Riding Hood devouring the wolf instead of vice versa. There's something you can do, Pisces, to ensure that the new versions of the old tales are more empowering than the originals: For the foreseeable future, take on the demeanour and spirit of a noble warrior with high integrity and a fluid sense of humour. Go west, fYrefly

QUEER MONTON
tam@vueweekly.com
Tamara Gorzalka

They do things differently in British Columbia. At least that's what everyone has always told me. I'd never really given much credence to the thought, though, always assuming that the Canadian mentality was a blanket one that didn't vary all that much from province to province, and that believing otherwise about BC meant buying into a stereotype. Silly me; I forgot that stereotypes are often built from a grain of truth, because by golly do they do things different here.

My annual gay camp report is coming from a new locale this year, one filled with ocean and forests and a wicked farmer's tan. In case you've missed it, Camp fYrefly is an annual leadership retreat for LGBTQA youth. This year, the Edmonton born-and-bred program celebrated its fifth anniversary by expanding to three other provinces, debuting in BC at the beginning of July before heading to Newfoundland and Saskatchewan later this summer.

I felt very lucky to have the opportunity to go to Gambier Island, in the Howe Sound, for the inaugural BC camp. The long bus trip to the ferry and chatting on the boat bonded everyone before we even got to the site, and I knew things were headed somewhere great. Only 125 people live on Gambier, and it's very peaceful—or at least it was until 70 happy and loud homos showed up.

Like I said, things are different in BC. For one, schedules aren't particularly important. In Edmonton, we like to stay as organized and structured as possible, but the fact that we were behind schedule before we even stepped off the boat didn't seem to bother anyone but me. I was forced to relax and let things happen as they unfolded, and it ended up working out alright.

In BC, everyone has a voice. It doesn't matter if there's a plan, because someone might need to change it or someone might have a better one. I learned that sharing and developing programs as we went was a good way to make sure they fit all the campers' needs. Before camp I would have told you that this kind of socialist approach meant we would never get anything done. I might still say the same thing, but I'd also say that with everyone sharing their thoughts and suggesting ideas, the camp felt more adaptive to our needs.

This year was much closer to a "real" summer camp than I'd ever experienced in my life. My legs are still raw with mosquito bites and I was never happy with a generator that shut off at 11 pm, taking the running water with it. I didn't know the ocean water would be so damn cold or that rocks and barnacles can cut up your un-sandled feet. I really am a city girl.

The authentic camp experience had drawbacks, but also surprising bonuses. Taking time to do the dishes of 70 people was frustrating, but I heard from some youth leaders that it was the bonding experience they needed to get to know their group.

My favourite place to have meetings was the chapel. While we had removed all religious objects from the camp, the chapel itself remained, a clearing in the forest with a few benches looking out onto the ocean. I held meetings there and had my own time in it. My group even wrote the script for our play—where Cinderella is transformed by her fairy drag mother into CinderElliot and escapes the clutches of her evil Phelps stepfamily, finally marrying Prince Palin, the now-grown-up son of Sarah Palin's daughter Bristol—in this sacred space. If more religious services took place in a forest clearing, I'd be more inclined to go.

What I'll never tire of with Camp fYrefly is the way people seem so touched by the camp. A couple days in, they begin talking about what would be cool for next year when they return, and they're already asking if you're coming back and when it's going to be.

Every year has been amazing, and I can't rank them in my heart, but I'm aware that something resonated deeply with me on that Island in a way I hadn't felt before at fYrefly or anywhere else. I'm not a person who believes much in a higher power, but there was something in the air around me. I felt connected to lapping ocean waves, moved by the clear night sky and complete silence, at peace with the deer I accidentally ran into on the beach or the raccoon that spooked me outside my cabin at midnight. Something in the earth there let me feel connected to the ground and feel light at the same time. Like I was cleansed.

The Camp fYrefly BC experience was an amazing one, differences to approach aside. Maybe I'll never tap into my inner hippy enough to fully enjoy it but hey, they need someone around to keep them in line. And I need an event that can help me to let go a little. Besides, any place that can cause me to lose my drag virginity and perform a synchronized dance as a Backstreet Boy has to have some kind of magic going on. V

The one true way

Dear Readers:

WebMD sent out this slightly goofy "10 Amazing Health Benefits of Sex," an article virtually identical to dozens of others I've dutifully read. Among the benefits of "healthy loving in a relationship," according to the article (summaries mine) are:

ALT. SEX
altsex@vueweekly.com
Andrea Nemerson

1. Less stress Volunteers kept sex diaries and were then subjected to stressful situations. "Those who had intercourse had better responses to stress than those who engaged in other sexual behaviours or abstained."

Neat. I'm interested to note that it's intercourse, rather than other sex acts. Added to the older study that found that feel-good hormone levels spike after intercourse but not masturbation, it's starting to look like penis-vagina intercourse produces a unique hormonal response and possibly provides unique payoffs in the health-and-well-being department. It would be nice if someone thought to check whether intercourses available to the non-p/v-sex-having population produce similar effects.

2. Immunity People who have sex once or twice a week produce more immunoglobulin A (IgA), an important antibody to common infections. Subjects who reported having less or a whole lot more sex have lower IgA.

Huh. Moderation in all things, right? I guess we shouldn't be surprised to find it applies to sex. But does it; or were there other factors here? Maybe the high- IgA moderates were in committed relationships, while the nevers were lonely and the horn-dogs were sleeping around? Who knows?

3. Calories "30 minutes of sex burns 85 calories or more," claims WebMD. "It may not sound like much, but it adds up: 42 half-hour sessions will burn 3570 calories, more than enough to lose a pound. Doubling up, you could drop that pound in 21 hour-long sessions."

I've seen umpteen versions of the ridiculous sex/calories breakdown and this might be the silliest yet. Forty-two half-hour sessions (of apparently extremely energetic pumping; if you want foreplay or a kissing break you'll have to budget extra time) will take most couples months to achieve, and few people rack up anything like 21 hour-long sessions in a lifetime. You'd be better off on a treadmill.

4. Cardiovascular Researches found that neither having nor not-having sex was correlated with strokes, which is nice. More impressively, they "also found that having sex twice or more a week reduced the risk of fatal heart attack by half for the men, compared with those who had sex less than once a month."

Again, there may be other factors here, since the heart-healthy guys presumably had partners, and both loneliness and the death of a spouse are highly correlated with dropping dead. Broken hearts cause broken hearts. Still, nice news for older men who do have partners.

5. Self-esteem "Boosting self-esteem was one of 237 reasons people have sex, collected by University of Texas researchers and published in the Archives of Sexual Behavior."

Hahaha! Two-hundred and thirty-seven is a mighty big number. You could fit anything in there. Reason # 6: Getting partner to leave you alone so you can go to sleep. Reason # 33: bored. Reason #235: free rent.

6. Intimacy Sex and orgasms raise levels of oxytocin, the famous bonding, trust and generosity hormone. The article goes on to cite a study showing that women's levels of oxytocin rise after "warm contact" and hugs with their husbands, but you don't need sex to get that.

7. Pain "In a study published in the Bulletin of Experimental Biology and Medicine, 48 volunteers who inhaled oxytocin vapour and then had their fingers pricked lowered their pain threshold by more than half."

8. Prostate Cancer "Men who had five or more ejaculations weekly while in their 20s reduced their risk of getting prostate cancer later by a third."

There are a lot of similar studies supporting this. And finally, a clear benefit not dependent on male/female intercourse! Any old ejaculation will do it.

9. Sleep Oxytocin and exercise promote sleep, and lack of same is correlated with every bad thing from divorce to weight gain.

That's ... nine. I lost one somewhere.

Of course, few of us need a specific reason to have sex, nor are we likely to be sufficiently motivated by any of the above to go get some if not already inclined. As for the slightly worrisome implication that emerges from these articles that there is one true (straight, vanilla, monogamous) sex-style that is good for us, well. If we want research into the cardiovascular effects of polyamory or immune responses to S&M, we're just going to have to do it ourselves.

Love, Andrea
